WHAT'S INSIDE

The age of cash and checks is waning amid the worldwide rise of real-time payment networks. Today's consumers are increasingly demanding instant settlements, same-day ACH and other electronic options that promise to shorten the time between payment and disbursement.

That's not to say that real-time payments have cleared all obstacles in their paths, however. Fraud issues, identification problems and other frictions remain as these services continue to expand and the global banking world becomes more connected. Governments, card networks, banks and FinTechs are all addressing these challenges as they build faster transaction networks that can deliver payments to customers in a matter of seconds.

Some markets are developing real-time networks faster than others, though, meaning governments' and countries' disbursement practices can differ greatly. Instant transfers have been operational in the United Kingdom for several years, but the creation of such a system in the United States is at least a few years away, for example.

Card networks and financial institutions (FIs) are also developing real-time payments tools. Deutsche Bank, TSB and others are creating new fraud protections to bolster the digital disbursements space, while Visa recently announced several upcoming payments innovations.

Around the disbursements world

Visa also recently acquired British FinTech Earthport, which facilitates faster cross-border payments via relationships with local banks in various markets. The purchase will enable the former's customers to instantly send and receive money around the world.

eCommerce giant Amazon is looking into India's faster payments system, the Unified Payments Interface (UPI), to facilitate real-time person-to-person (P2P) transactions. Payment processor PayFi is also getting into the instant disbursements game with the acquisition of Payment Relationship Management (PRM). The former hopes the latter will help it facilitate real-time settlements between bank accounts.

Real-time payments' speed can also put consumers at greater risk of fraud. FIs have less time to review transfers, meaning bad actors can take advantage and make off with funds. Fraud reimbursements typically cover only money stolen in hacks or cases of identity theft, but British bank TSB will now reimburse victims of all attacks, including push payment scams. This type of fraud cost U.K. consumers approximately £354 million ($450 million USD) last year, and only a small portion was refunded.

To learn more about these stories and what's happening in the disbursements world, visit the Tracker's News and Trends section (p. 10).

Rhino wants to make cash security deposits the exception, not the rule

Digital payments are becoming common in customer-facing industries like retail and ridesharing, but consumers often still expect to hand over envelopes of cash for larger transactions, such as rental security deposits. Paraag Sarva, CEO and co-founder of Rhino, suggested that renters could instead sign up for digital insurance policies against unpaid rent and damage — which would be more secure than turning over thousands of dollars in cash to landlords. For this Tracker's Feature Story (p. 6), Sarva spoke with PYMNTS about why cash security deposits should become a thing of the past.

Deep Dive: Understanding government disbursements

Banks, FinTechs and employers are racing ahead with disbursements developments, but government changes have always come at a slower pace. The latter's transfers follow different rules, many of which are still being adjusted to accommodate the rise of digital and cross-border payments. Millions of consumers around the globe rely on government disbursements, however, meaning a compromise between oversight and innovation is needed to ensure recipients' payments arrive on time. Visit the Tracker's Deep Dive (p. 14) to learn more about how governments are improving digital disbursements and upgrading their payout methods.

EXECUTIVE INSIGHT

How critical are faster disbursements for insurance providers that want to stay competitive and better engage customers?

"It's no secret that the claims process is often the moment that matters most for insurance customers. In fact, a 2014 study by Accenture [entitled], 'Why Claims Service Matters,' found that 83 percent of customers [who were] dissatisfied with the way claims were handled planned to switch or had already switched to new providers.

For years, insurers focused on improving the claims filing process, arriving at a point where most can be completed online or over the phone in a matter of minutes. But for many, the last mile of claims payments remains unaddressed and continues to rely on paper checks in the mail or ACH deposits to bank accounts.

Customers hate having to wait for these antiquated payment methods to get their lives back on track after a catastrophic accident or natural [disaster]. Multiple PYMNTS studies back this up, repeatedly finding that checks are the least-preferred payment instrument [and that they have] single-digit consumer satisfaction ratings.

Instead of forcing customers to wait by the mailbox or continually hit refresh on their bank account balances, push payments allow them to accept payments instantly and into the accounts of their choosing. It can literally mean the difference between missing days of work without an automobile or putting a roof back on a home before the next rainstorm.

Providers like Safelite Solutions and Prelude Software using Ingo Money's instant money solutions have told us that insurers stand to gain multiple bottom line business benefits from push payment disbursements — customer satisfaction and loyalty, competitive differentiation, even operational improvements. By giving customers real-time payment options that fulfill on promises of convenience and choice with confidence, insurers can separate themselves from the pack."

THE CASE FOR FREEING UP
$190B In
Security Deposits

Many tenants must deal with landlords asking for cash or checks at the end of the month. Traditional payment methods are common in all aspects of real estate: managing rent, moving costs, broker fees and security deposits, with the latter representing $190 billion of renters' funds. Tenants and property owners are also forced into legacy reimbursement processes that can continue for months at a time. Landlords seeking payments for property damage or unpaid rent often need to withdraw funds from escrow accounts, safety deposit boxes or other holding methods, while renters often wait weeks or months for their security deposits to settle in their bank accounts. These processes are frustrating for consumers who are used to digital transactions that take minutes or seconds to complete.

These antiquated methods present an opportunity for the real estate world to rethink how it approaches security deposits, especially as younger consumers enter the market. Paraag Sarva, CEO and co-founder of Rhino, believes eliminating cash-based security deposits and replacing them with insurance policies could be the answer.

"Cash security deposits are used to protect owners from something that may or may not happen in the future, [but] that's really the definition of what insurance is for," Sarva said in a recent interview with PYMNTS.

Sarva believes that replacing cash security deposits with insurance policies is more efficient and creates lasting relationships between tenants and landlords.

Such solutions would also eliminate a decades-old friction point in that relationship.

"Whether you're a first-time renter, second-time renter [or] lifetime renter ... [it's] about creating a transactional efficiency by replacing a cash security deposit with a form of insurance," he said.

The rental market's strange grip on cash

Cash has maintained a stronghold in the real estate world, where tenants seem to regard it as the typical way to rent, despite its many inconveniences.

"When you think about it, it's kind of silly that, in 2019, people are [making] cash security deposits, but that's the habit," Sarva said.

Consumers would find it odd to leave a $5,000 cash deposit to rent a car, he noted.

"Yet, when you rent an apartment — which is bigger checks, bigger amounts of money — people are so ingrained to think, 'Of course I have to leave a cash deposit to protect against something that might or might not happen.'"

Residential security deposits are currently valued at $40 billion for the U.S. market alone, he said. Eliminating these deposits would put thousands of dollars back into tenants' hands, which can be critical for first-time renters like recent college graduates or professionals moving into new areas, who may need the funds for moving expenses.

Tenants can use Rhino's platform to sign up for a monthly insurance policy that removes the frustrations that come from parting with a large volume of cash while still protecting the landlord. Tenants pay the installment fee digitally, and landlords can file for claims to be reimbursed for missing rent or other issues via same-day ACH transfers. This practice is very different from how consumers typically perceive both the leasing and insurance processes, which continue to be manual and paper-based.

Not only is cash an outdated way to rent or reimburse tenants and landlords, but it can also affect many renters' financial health, he added.

"Moving costs are what they are in 2019 — it's everyone's largest [payment] whether you're renting a home or buying a home, but certainly if you're renting," Sarva said, adding that the average rent for an apartment in Manhattan, New York, hovers around

$4,100. "It's a big chunk of money to have to pay first month's rent, security deposit, sometimes a broker's fee [and] other moving expenses."

The future of the rental world

There may be a growing need for services such as Rhino's, but replacing cash deposits with insurance policies or electronic contracts isn't the easiest of tasks, he noted.

"I think we're still at the very infancy of this sort of movement," Sarva said, adding that Rhino is also looking at technologies like artificial intelligence (AI), which could shorten the time it takes to approve a claim or reimbursement. "By and large, the de facto way those transactions are done today are cash security deposits, and we're just starting to make a dent in turning that tide. I'd love to see that flip to where cash security deposits are the exception."

Cash security deposits may remain the dominant method in the rental world for the next few years, but renters are fast losing interest in them. As consumers get used to completing complex financial transactions online, real estate and insurance processes are likely to follow the digital payments route.

NEWS & TRENDS

Banks and disbursements

UK bank TSB pledges to reimburse customers for disbursement fraud

Real-time disbursements often result in increased fraud, which is why the U.K.'s TSB will now refund all fraud victims. The Fraud Refund Guarantee went into effect in April and covers all fraud losses, including money stolen through authorized push payments. The bank previously refunded only specific types of fraud losses. Push payment scams trick legitimate customers into transferring funds to fraudsters' accounts, costing U.K. consumers approximately £354 million ($450 million USD) in 2018, with only a small share being refunded.

Deutsche Bank releases instant payments in Malaysia

Instant payments are seeing rapid growth in new markets such as Malaysia, where Germany's Deutsche Bank just launched a new payments system. The FI's rail connects with Malaysia's DuitNow instant credit clearing system and allows corporate clients to make payments that can be processed within 20 seconds.

DuitNow also helps FIs provide greater fraud control, as it does not require clients to keep their workers' bank details on file. Deutsche stated that clients can transmit funds directly to employees' National ID numbers and that users can pay back deposits by dialing in with linked mobile numbers.

Brazilian lender to launch QR-based instant payment method

Brazilian lender Itaú Unibanco Holding is hoping to provide better instant payments with a new QR-based system. Its Iti solution is currently in development and will allow payments via an app connecting customers and merchants for faster transactions. Users will be able to make retail and P2P payments by scanning QR codes in the app, which will be made available across Brazil by Q3.

Iti's development is inspired by the Chinese market, where QR codes are a popular payment method among consumers. Approximately one-third of Brazilian adults currently lack checking accounts, and Itaú hopes its app will entice this group of consumers.

Partnerships and acquisitions

Visa's acquisition of Earthport brings instant disbursements to local markets

Visa recently acquired British FinTech Earthport with the goal of improving support for real-time cross-border payments via the latter's relationships with local banks in more than 87 countries. The $257 million purchase allows Visa's clients and end-consumers to transfer money to bank accounts around the world while reducing transaction wait times. Enabling instant payments is becoming important for all companies, as $80 trillion in transactions are made via wire or online every year.

PayFi acquires PRM for real-time payment innovations

PayFi is also turning to acquisitions to offer faster payment options. The payment processor recently acquired Payment Relationship Management (PRM) to create a banking-as-a-service settlement platform that will offer real-time transfers supported by AI and other learning technologies.

PRM co-founders Peter Gordon and Mark Elliot — both Mastercard veterans — will remain with PayFi to further develop the platform. The company hopes the acquisition will enable faster transactions between accounts and more personalized relationships with banks, FinTechs and end users.

Ixaris partners with Banking Circle for cross-border travel payments

Cross-border travel payments come with their own challenges, namely foreign exchange (FX) fluctuations. Travel payments company Ixaris is partnering with financial services provider Banking Circle to ease those frictions with a new payments solution. The latter's Virtual IBAN product will connect with features offered by the former, resulting in a tool that will enable businesses to instantly make payments to various markets around the globe and without the headache of changing FX rates. The solution will initially work with 25 different currencies, and the two companies hope it will improve regulatory compliance among different countries.

Government bodies and new markets

The Fed is still years away from a real-time payments system

The United States Federal Reserve is still years away from creating a real-time payments system, despite its proposal for such a tool last October. Susan Foley, senior associate director of program direction for the Fed, stated that it is still debating whether it should take an active role in real-time payments. Same Day ACH is another area of focus for the Fed. NACHA – The Electronic Payments Association is looking to add a third settlement window to ease time constraints for West Coast FIs, something that could complicate the Fed's FedWire and National Settlement Service.

Visa creates ePayment initiative in two Brazilian cities

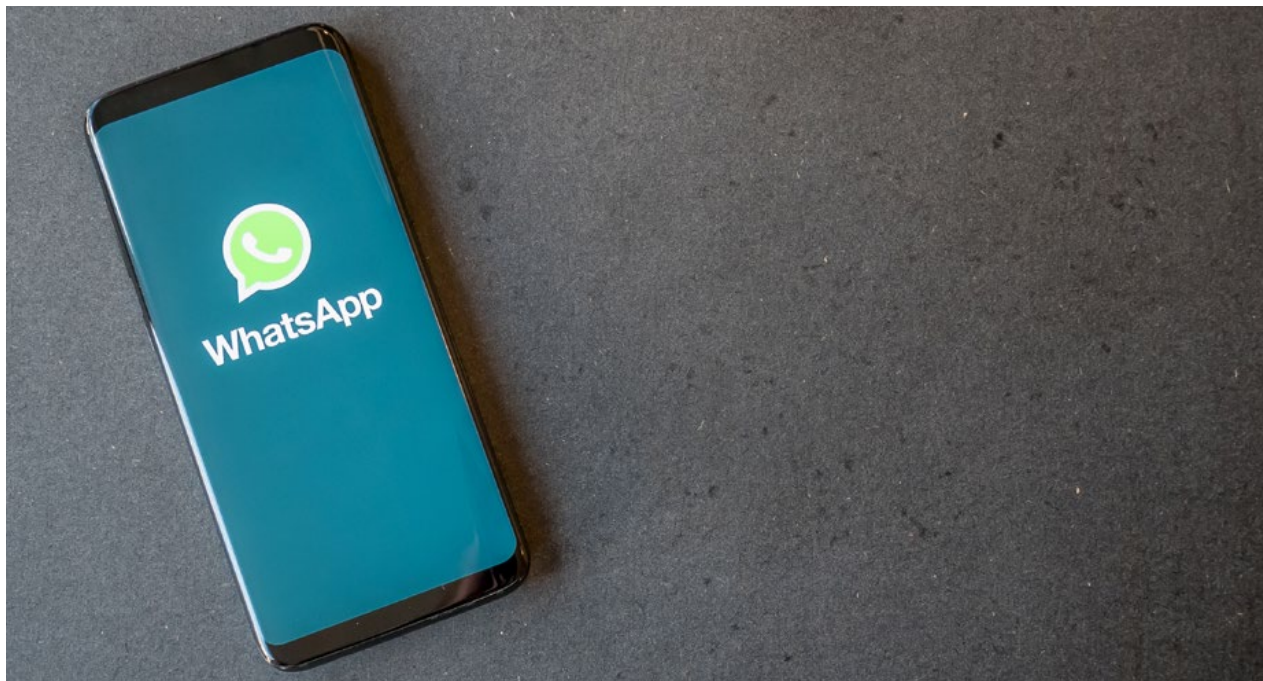

Visa is continuing to work on faster payments in Brazil, where it has partnered with Latin American FinTech company EBANX. Visa will help develop an initiative in two Brazilian cities — Cascavel and Paranaguá — that will bring digital payments to local businesses and their customers. Three thousand point-of-sale (POS) terminals will be installed at retailers in both cities as part of the initiative.

The two companies are also seeking to improve access to products and services and promote digital payments' security. Visa and EBANX plan to eventually expand the initiative into other parts of the country.

Facebook creates London team for WhatsApp instant payments

WhatsApp owner and operator Facebook has created a London-based team to enable faster payments via the app. WhatsApp plans to add 100 new employees to its operation to further build out its mobile payments platform, which Facebook plans to introduce to several new countries this year.

Facebook is focusing on payments both in and outside WhatsApp as it works to bring more financial tools to Messenger and Instagram. The company is also in talks with Visa and Mastercard to develop a full-scale payments network, although no launch date has been announced.

P2P payments and mobile developments

Amazon Uses India's UPI for P2P payments

eCommerce company Amazon is tapping India's UPI to facilitate P2P payments in the region. Amazon Pay UPI recently launched after the company overcame several regulatory challenges, and the service allows users to make real-time P2P and bill payments, add credit to their accounts and make offline transactions. A company representative added that Amazon Pay UPI also stores users' recent transactions, smoothing the process for recurring purchases or bill payments.

Uber Eats adds support for Apple Pay

Uber Eats is turning to mobile wallets as it expands into different markets and courts new users. The company recently added Apple Pay support to its app in nearly 20 markets, including Belgium, Canada, France, New Zealand, Taiwan, the U.K. and the U.S. The move follows the company's decision to integrate Venmo payments after noticing that 6 million Uber-related charges were made via the platform. Uber Eats continues to accept more traditional payment methods, such as credit and debit cards and PayPal.

British eMoney issuer PFS launches Fitbit Pay

U.K.-based eMoney issuer PFS recently launched support for Fitbit Pay, enabling the former's cardholders to make transactions using their Fitbit wearables. Users can connect credit, debit or prepaid Mastercard cards to their Fitbit accounts, allowing them to use the devices for payment. PFS customers can utilize the solution to make contactless payments, which are becoming more popular as the region's consumers grow accustomed to contactless transportation terminals and other daily use cases. Such payments are accepted at a growing number of U.K. businesses, but security concerns over smart wristbands are prevalent and could hamper growth.

DEEP DIVE

How governments are innovating disbursements

Regulatory pressures require governments to tread more carefully than businesses and startups when innovating payments. This innovation is long overdue, however, as many government settlements still rely on cash or checks. Traditional methods continue to pose unique challenges for those who use them: The processing times take longer than today's consumers have come to expect, cash remains cumbersome and risky to transport and checks can take up to a week to fully clear.

Governments are looking to replace these payment types with digital disbursement models that simplify both government-to-business (G2B) and government-to-person (G2P) transactions. Digital payments and card-based solutions have quicker clearing times and meet consumers' demands, but how these entities innovate such payments depends on the particular needs and comforts of their markets.

The U.S. now mandates that government benefit program disbursements be sent electronically, while other countries are securing such payments with biometric authentication methods. Government departments in China and Mongolia are also getting involved in digital disbursements by issuing credit cards to employees and implementing eReceipts for ease of use. South Korea is issuing such cards at a faster rate, expanding the digital payment methods that government employees can access for work-related expenses.

Digital disbursements around the world

Digitizing benefit program disbursements can be a painstaking process, especially in the U.S., where such methods can vary by state due to regulations and funding. A new law in the country mandates that all Women, Infants and Children (WIC) program disbursements must be made via electronic benefit transfer (EBT) cards by October 2020. Only 20 states have such systems in place, though, while the remaining 30 have yet to upgrade their benefit services for a variety of reasons, including lack of adequate funding, infrastructure and state government support. While EBT cards are different than some other card-based solutions, U.S. support for them is growing because they work similarly to credit and debit cards in terms of speed and clearing time.

Several Asia-Pacific countries, such as China, Mongolia and South Korea, are all making strides to replace cash-based government payments. Mongolia's government announced a digital payment program following continual updates to its fiscal banking laws. The country created a pilot program that issued credit cards to government employees last year, a move that was inspired by China, which had already implemented similar programs for its government employees. These three programs' cards can be used for travel expenditures and other work-related payments.

Indonesia is also focusing on digital payments. The country launched a credit card payments pilot for government employees in 2017, a test that proved successful and expanded last year. While testing details are still unknown, the country also used China's credit card program and electronic monitoring systems as blueprints for its services. Thailand, Vietnam and the Philippines have unveiled similar programs that utilize credit and debit cards to disburse government workers' payments.

Governments in these countries are moving quickly to digitize their disbursement processes, while other nations, such as the U.S., are still clinging to cash payments. The programs in the Asia-Pacific do not cover only one specific service or payment type, as is the case with the United States' WIC mandate. Their digital disbursement programs may be confined to government employees, but they have more sweeping jurisdictions than the small strides U.S. states have taken toward digital payments innovations.

While these countries may be pulling ahead of the U.S. in terms of digitizing disbursements, they all still face regulatory and security challenges.

Government disbursements and data security

Security is paramount to protecting digital disbursements, which are often targeted by bad actors and fraudsters. New rules in South Africa require citizens seeking government aid to submit both finger and voice scans. Biometric authentication methods such as these are more difficult for fraudsters to overcome, as recreating a fingerprint is nowhere near as easy as hacking a system to find a user's password.

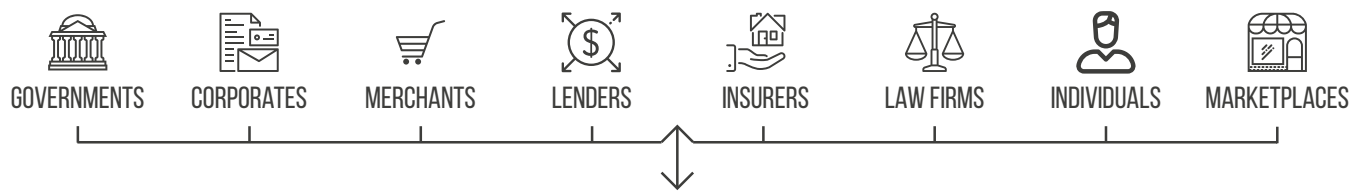

These new authentication methods are also being used to secure and expedite other forms of government payments. The South African Social Security Agency (SASSA) partnered with Mastercard to create a debit-based system for social security benefits, government pensions and other payments. Mastercard debit cards that are connected to citizens' biometric data are given to those who need them, and users must verify their fingerprints and voice scans with biometric readers to receive their disbursements.

Governments around the world are looking for newer and more innovative ways to improve payments to citizens and employees. Improved technologies and disbursement methods could change not just how consumers receive their funds, but how quickly they obtain them.

Ingo Money, headquartered in Atlanta, is the instant money company. Founded in 2001 with a mission to digitize the paper check, its push payments technology enables businesses and banks to disburse instant, safe-to-spend electronic funds from any source to consumers anywhere through more than four billion debit, prepaid, credit, private label credit and mobile wallet accounts. This transformation of traditional payments helps businesses reduce cost and delays while dramatically improving the consumer experience.

The Ingo Instant Payments gateway enables companies and banks to deliver instant, safe-to-spend funds directly into customer accounts. This "push payments in a box" solution offers industry leading benefits, including network ubiquity to reach more than four billion consumer accounts as well as all required compliance and security checks, through one simple API integration. Ingo Money has funded over $10 billion in transactions since launch, and completed the first push payment transaction in the U.S.
