WHAT'S INSIDE

Enabling access to instant payment innovations is becoming a top priority for businesses as demand for old-school methods, like paper checks, further declines. The 2020 United States tax season is proving that checks have lost their luster, with 74 percent of the country's citizens choosing to receive refunds through direct deposit, according to one study. The distaste for checks is boosting growth among other disbursement types as well, especially as more platforms that facilitate faster payments emerge.

The lack of enthusiasm surrounding checks has further grown in the wake of the new coronavirus pandemic. While online payments have been de rigueur for several years, many businesses in sectors such as manufacturing, retail and shipping are scrambling to deal with outdated, paper-based payment processes. Consumers are thus being challenged with disbursement delays arising from waiting for paper checks, having to cash them and waiting again for funds to arrive in their accounts. These issues are particularly frustrating for the more than 14 million Americans who are currently unbanked.

Stay-at-home orders for COVID-19 could lead to even greater reliance on digital disbursements, especially given that consumers and businesses are becoming less tolerant of payment delays and are seeking faster access to funds. Several entities are thus moving forward with plans to make sending and receiving digital payments even easier. This includes the Federal Reserve's FedNow network, which is set to launch by 2023.

These are promising developments in the push to digitize disbursements, but some problems persist. Fraud remains a concern, with hackers stepping up efforts to use on-line transactions' speeds to slip illegitimate interactions past providers. Businesses' affinities for paper checks continue to hinder customers' and vendors' access to faster disbursements. These and other issues will need to be solved before instant payments can reach the ubiquity necessary for critical adoption levels.

Around the disbursements world

COVID-19 could cause dramatic shifts in businesses' and consumers' long-term disbursement preferences, but the pandemic is already disrupting digital payouts. A multitude of companies have shuttered because of the virus, leaving many individuals without work and access to needed funds. The U.S. government debated multiple points in a $1 trillion stimulus bill intended to offer financial relief to hard-hit businesses and consumers, including how best to disburse such funds. Disbursing these funds is going to be challenging, however, as it is difficult for government agencies to send digital disbursements to financially underserved individuals or those who lack records.

COVID-19's spread might push companies to embrace digital disbursements, but businesses must also guard against human errors. A maximum of 2 percent of businesses' annual disbursements are erroneous or duplicated payments, according to a recent study, which added that this is often a result of incorrect data entry. Businesses thus need to embrace innovative solutions that can detect duplicated payouts and stop them before they occur.

Firms still have other worries to contend with as COVID-19 changes how they operate, with small to mid-sized businesses (SMBs) among the hardest hit. Many such companies are still relying on paper-based check payments to fulfill their needs, which could negatively affect their operations as COVID-19 pushes owners to close physical locations. Eighty percent of payments sent between businesses are made with paper checks, according to one study, making it difficult to track cash flows and manage daily operations. Many are finding this reliance detrimental as COVID-19 changes the way businesses work with their partners and their customers.

For more on these stories and other disbursements headlines, read the Tracker's News and Trends section (p. 12).

Trōv details mobile disbursement barriers

Forty-five percent of consumers around the world own smartphones, and a growing share expect these devices to have more functionality than ever before — which includes offering their preferred insurance disbursement preferences. Insurers have been slow to adopt these technologies due to legal and security concerns, but their opportunity to utilize mobile disbursements remains, especially as mobile phone adoption worldwide rises. In this month's Feature Story (p. 8), Michele Schmitt, senior product manager for Trōv, discusses how mobile disbursements are progressing and what is holding insurers back from full adoption.

Deep Dive: Businesses struggle with rising demand for mobile disbursements

American consumers are becoming more reliant on their smartphones to manage their lives, social interactions and disbursements. Many of the institutions they interact with for these payouts have yet to implement support for mobile disbursements, however, though this method is becoming more intriguing as demand grows. This Tracker's Deep Dive (p. 18) examines the current state of mobile disbursements, who is asking for them and why and whether businesses and their disbursement partners should implement them to satisfy new firms and customers.

EXECUTIVE INSIGHT

How do you see COVID-19 affecting the ways businesses and other entities are handling disbursements, and are these changes likely to continue after the pandemic?

“Much will be learned from COVID-19 in terms of how disbursements will be handled, with probably the most significant insights coming from the U.S. government and how it is having to deal with the disbursements of stimulus payments to both consumers and small businesses.

It is becoming more evident that those who need the money the most, and the fastest, may find it challenging to receive it through the government’s primary disbursement solution, direct deposit [done with] account information from previous tax returns. Perhaps an individual didn’t file taxes or changed bank accounts ... or does not even own a bank account to which funds can easily be distributed. The fallback becomes checks, which take even longer to arrive.

The financial challenges stemming from COVID-19 put into perspective the need for a better, modern disbursement solution – one that is ubiquitous, digital, 24/7 [year-round], on-demand and with an ability to provide people with choice in how they receive their funds with many instant payment options.

A disbursements marketplace, like Ingo Money, has the promise of providing that seamless disbursement experience to businesses and government entities with an ability to authenticate individuals or small businesses, verify their account information and ... facilitate payment choices that go beyond bank accounts, including debit and credit cards, prepaid cards, mobile wallets, cash ... and even checks.

What matters is that people get to decide how and when they ... receive their funds in the easiest and most efficient manner that works for them. The more instant options, the better – in this environment and likely for the foreseeable future.

Banks and businesses see the writing on the wall. What is likely to change after the pandemic is faster adoption of instant digital disbursement solutions that better prepare them to facilitate disbursements in real time [and] on demand, especially in times of great need.”

How Mobile
Technology
Is Changing
Insurance Claims

FEATURE STORY

There are several complexities associated with reviewing and settling claims, given the nature of the insurance industry, which requires stringent customer authentication and documentation.

The uptick in smartphone use and availability, however, has prompted many insurance providers to enable customers to file claims from their phones, but few have implemented mobile disbursements.

“I think one of the largest reasons [insurers are still using checks] is because claim payments, the paying out of a claim, is [a] loss of money, and it is really hard for companies to focus or invest resources in a place in which you are losing money already,” Michele Schmitt, senior product manager for B2B insurance technology firm Trōv, said in a recent interview with PYMNTS.

All that is starting to change, especially as more consumers turn to social media to seek support from their insurers, or even air their grievances.

“So, if an insurance company does not invest in the customer experience of the claim, like during the claim flow, that is going to come back to them,” she said.

Developing that claim flow can be difficult, though, especially when it entails enabling access to mobile disbursements.

Mobile insurance disbursement challenges

The initial barrier blocking mobile payout adoption in the insurance world was simple: The technology to support such disbursements for many claims did not yet exist. This is no longer the case thanks to the widespread availability and adoption of digital wallets. Institutions such as The Clearing House (TCH) and the Federal Reserve have also created payment networks that have made faster, digital payments a reality for B2B and business-to-consumer (B2C) payment processes alike. Many insurance disbursement flows are still reliant on paper checks, however, according to Schmitt.

Trōv has looked to solve for these issues by supporting digital automated clearing house (ACH) payments for its insurance partners, significantly cutting down the time it takes consumers to receive funds and businesses to finalize payments.

“We send claim payments through ACH,” Schmitt said. “One of the best positives of that, from a business standpoint, [is] the business knows exactly where the money is, where it went, where it came from and when it went to where it was going, and there is a lot less room for error than there is with checks. A check is just, you put it in the mail, who knows when it gets cashed, [or] then it never gets cashed and [businesses] have to write another – it just gets really messy really fast.”

The challenge is thus not figuring out if mobile disbursements are possible, but how they can be made, given insurers’ legal and compliance issues. There are several options that can be used to send real-time payments to claimants, but many offerings are still undergoing legal or security checks, Schmitt said. Trōv has yet to build out support for more innovative mobile disbursement methods, but it does have the technical capacity to do so.

“[Payment] innovation is definitely one of those things that, when it is mentioned and brought up, everybody loves the idea,” Schmitt said. “The insurance people love the idea, the customer support [and] the marketing people love that idea, but then, when it actually comes time to make the concept a reality, we hit a lot of brick walls when it comes to insurance legal [regulations]. ... There are [some] who just say, ‘Well we have always done it this way, this is the way we know is legal, we are interpreting it this way.’ So it is hard to get people to interpret the laws of insurance through a digital lens.”

Mobile and InsurTech’s future

The insurance space is keeping a careful eye on mobile developments, especially as consumers begin to rely on social media channels as much as traditional customer service channels. That means firms must make sure that disbursements and all other customer experiences can be accessed on multiple channels – including mobile.

A big focus in the insurance industry right now is enabling digitized end-to-end customer experiences, which means enabling online support for all parts of the insurance experience, rather than starting the customer experience online and devolving back into paper processes, Schmitt noted.

“Everyone is trying to figure out how they can make that customer experience for claims as good as the purchase experience, and that is where it is going to keep going,” she said.

Finding ways to tailor the entirety of the insurance experience, including disbursements, for mobile is becoming important for traditional insurance players – especially as younger claimants, including millennials and members of Generation Z, expect high levels of support via such channels. Insurers need to be ready for the shift to mobile.

NEWS & TRENDS

DISBURSEMENTS AND COVID-19

US government contemplates ways to disburse COVID-19 stimulus funds

U.S. federal and state government agencies are searching for ways to help residents during the COVID-19 pandemic, which has shut down businesses across the globe and left many without paychecks. The U.S. government is seeking to help by sending eligible residents up to $1,200 in assistance using information gathered from Internal Revenue Service (IRS) tax records. This comes with challenges, however, given that both checks and direct deposits have weak points as nationwide disbursal methods, according to John Koskinen, former commissioner for the IRS. Checks are cumbersome and costly, even on a small scale, he explained, but direct deposits can be sent to citizens who have received tax payouts via the method. Individuals who make below a certain income threshold and thus do not have to file would not be on record and would be easy to miss when sending out the stimulus funds, Koskinen explained.

Treasury Department outlines tentative plan

The U.S. Treasury Department detailed its plan for disbursing stimulus funds during March, and eventually passed a measure to provide funds to citizens. The final proposal was the result of fierce debate as representatives suggested sending U.S. taxpayers who earn less than $99,000 annually between $1,200 and $2,000 per month while COVID-19 stay-at-home orders remain in place before settling on a one-time payment of $1,200. The best disbursement method – direct deposits or checks – was also debated, since many of the country's lower-income individuals do not have access to online bank accounts.

The department's plan also includes a motion to disburse stimulus funds to businesses in various industries, such as airlines and SMBs, which will ensure these entities can weather closures without falling behind on critical payments or, in severe cases, declaring bankruptcy.

Restaurants consider instant payouts during COVID-19

The restaurant industry is seeing a marked impact from COVID-19 as the virus continues to close establishments in the U.S. and other countries. Recent forecasts from the National Restaurant Association predict that COVID-19-related closures will cost dining establishments approximately $225 billion. Many of these restaurants are no longer operating their physical locations, save for enabling food pickup, and they thus are looking to utilize digital disbursements for staff members and delivery drivers. Instant payments are still relatively new and could present challenges for those in the industry, according to Drew Edwards, CEO of Ingo Money.

Instant payout capabilities are especially critical for tipping – an important source of income for waitstaff. Quick-service restaurants (QSRs) may have a minor advantage over dine-in restaurants when implementing these payments. Many QSRs have already partnered with third-party delivery services such as DoorDash or Grubhub, which have tipping built into their mobile app experiences, according to Brian Hassan, CEO of tipping solutions provider Kickfin. Sit-down restaurants tend to have cash-heavy tipping processes, which digital takeout orders hinder. These entities must thus adapt to compete and pay workers during the ongoing pandemic.

US Small Business Administration works to disburse loans

SMBs have been hit particularly hard by COVID-19, with many struggling to keep afloat amid a decline in consumer spending. The U.S. Small Business Administration is looking to help firms weather the pandemic's effects by setting up call centers, through which it can better support SMBs looking for education, resources and funds. One recent report noted that the agency can receive up to 30,000 calls per day.

The administration will become responsible for disbursing and managing a $350 billion loan program for SMBs – those with fewer than 500 employees – that was part of the $2.2 trillion aid package the U.S. congress passed for economic renewal. Qualifying businesses can apply via an online portal, where they can provide financial documentation to support their applications. The administration noted that initial payments will arrive within five business days after approval.

GLOBAL INSTANT PAYMENT UPDATES

Easypaisa partners with Seed Out for funds disbursement

Lawmakers and payment providers in multiple countries are keeping a close eye on COVID-19, which may cause further shifts to digital disbursements and payments. Certain markets made digital shifts just before COVID-19 fully hit, with Pakistani regulators and businesses making strides to improve digital disbursement adoption across multiple industries, for example. The country's top mobile financial services provider, Easypaisa, is teaming up with crowdfunding platform Seed Out to enable disbursements, the two companies stated.

Easypaisa will be responsible for both collection and disbursement of payments for Seed Out, which enables underprivileged consumers to fund entrepreneurial products. Individuals list their projects and how much money they need to complete them, while others browse the site and donate funds to projects of their choice. Easypaisa will then disburse those funds to the entrepreneur who listed the project. Easypaisa will enable Seed Out to quickly send funds and foster further innovation and future projects, Zain Ashraf, founder of Seed Out, noted in a press release.

LendingKart teams up with Northern Arc Capital

Digital payments are also spurring more innovation and enabling faster disbursements in India. Lending startup LendingKart is working with non-banking financial service provider Northern Arc Capital to enable loan disbursements to the country's SMBs. The partnership will allow these businesses to instantly borrow funds without relying on manual processes.

The two firms will pitch this product to startups that typically lack access to capital, according to a news release. LendingKart will handle disbursements via a software integration with Northern Arc Capital's digital credit platform, Nimbus. The partnership aims to make the lending service available to SMBs across the country, as the area is currently seeing rapid growth in digital lending as well as other online financial products.

Metro Bank to work with ezbob for SMB lending

U.K.-based providers are also looking to provide faster disbursements to SMBs, with British financial institution (FI) Metro Bank working with banking software service ezbob on a new digital lending product. The tool will take businesses through the entirety of the loan process within one day and handle everything from applications to security and identity verifications to loan offers and acceptances. Loan funds will be disbursed to recipients on the same day their application is approved.

The partnership represents one of several recent collaborations Metro Bank has announced, including one with Conance and Funding Options that further enhanced its loan options for SMBs. Metro Bank appears to be shifting its focus to SMB lending, abandoning other plans for expansion, including its previous goal to open 15 branches in northern England.

SECURITY AND FRAUD

Preventing cash flow issues arising from duplicate disbursements

Keeping track of accounts payable (AP) can be fairly complicated for businesses that rely on paper-based processes, causing them to make erroneous payments. A recent study found that a maximum of 2 percent of businesses' annual disbursements are either duplicated or incorrect. This may not be a large amount in terms of percentages, but such issues can have serious implications on companies' cash flows, resulting in tens of thousands of dollars in lost funds. Most incorrect payouts result from human error and often arise from data entry mistakes or out-of-date information, which can lead to replicated disbursements. This can be remedied with artificial intelligence (AI) or machine learning (ML), which can catch and isolate these errors faster than human employees and prevent duplicate payments from being sent.

Fraudsters continue to roll out tax scams

The U.S. extended its tax-filing deadline to July 15 due to COVID-19, but many taxpayers are still confused about what the pandemic may mean for their tax returns. Fraudsters can take advantage of this confusion, with one report noting that tax scams are still thriving. Such schemes target consumers with phone calls or phishing emails, with 21 percent of the fraud schemes taxpayers experienced being conducted over the phone and 12 percent via email. Consumers often become easy targets during this time as they are more willing to entertain calls from unknown numbers and emails from tax preparers with whom they then share their personal financial data.

Consumers in younger age groups are more likely to fall victim to such schemes than older individuals, mostly due to a lack of awareness. Twenty-seven percent of millennials are unaware of tax scams compared to 17 percent of Gen X individuals, according to the report.

Examining instant payment fraud under FedNow

The Federal Reserve's instant payment service, FedNow, is expected to come into play as early as 2023. U.S. businesses are eagerly awaiting the system's arrival, with 80 percent of business owners stating they were interested in instant fund transfers. FedNow will enable businesses to send and receive up to $25,000 instantly and round-the-clock. The platform will see some persistent problems that surround digital disbursements and payments, however, including increased likelihood of fraud due to increased payment speeds.

Payments that are processed faster could lead to more fraud slipping through, as has been seen in the U.K. Some reports state that U.K. banks have consistently experienced larger fraud losses since implementing its Faster Payments Service (FPS). It is estimated that U.K. bankers will need to block $398 million in banking fraud attempts this year. The FedNow platform should prepare for a similar surge in fraud once it is rolled out.

CHECK TRENDS

Consumers demand disbursement choice

Checks have been falling out of favor since the 1990s, when consumers started using digital payment methods for daily transactions. Today's consumers have seemingly numerous options when making payments and they also expect the same choices when receiving them: Over 72 percent of U.S. consumers believe it is important to have choice in how they receive disbursements. Old-school payment methods, such as paper checks for B2C payments, can prove detrimental for businesses. A recent Federal Reserve study found that U.S. consumers under 25 used checks for less than 1 percent of their total payments in 2019. Checks are still clinging on to payment processes that do not involve consumers, who are more used to instant payments, however.

Businesses continue to cling to paper checks for B2B payments

A recent study found that 80 percent of business-to-business (B2B) payments are still sent out via paper checks, despite ample innovation in the space. Firms are struggling to grant these payments the same level of speed as seen in B2C or person-to-person (P2P) payments, both areas in which real-time payment networks have been steadily expanding. One reason B2B payments are still so dependent on legacy methods like checks is because of necessary security and verification processes.

Paper checks have thus remained a staple for B2B payments, even as many U.S. businesses express their frustrations with slow wait times and the costs incurred by relying on such disbursements. It is difficult to pinpoint when checks will truly die out, Juliet Negrete-Anderson, chief operating officer for AP company OnPay Solutions, noted in a recent interview with PYMNTS.

Businesses understand checks and upgrading to digital systems can be costly, meaning that checks will likely stay around for a while longer. Eliminating checks entirely would require a digital payments solution with this same level of familiarity and ease of use – without the payment frustration, Negrete-Anderson noted.

DEEP DIVE

HOW CUSTOMER BEHAVIORS ARE DRIVING DEMAND FOR MOBILE DISBURSEMENT INNOVATION

The number of smartphone users worldwide has grown exponentially in recent years, with some reports projecting there will be 3.5 billion users by the end of the year. Companies are continuously trying to meet these customers where they are, which means they must offer their full range of services via mobile — including hassle-free disbursements. The demand for mobile disbursements comes as more consumers rely on their smartphones for their financial needs. These individuals also expect faster payments in their day-to-day lives thanks to their interactions with P2P payment apps.

Mobile disbursements have obvious appeal among consumers, 71 percent of whom want choice in how they receive their funds. Providing mobile disbursements is relatively easy as well and in some cases requires firms to simply integrate mobile wallet support. This ease explains why retailers and other businesses have been growing more interested in this area.

There has been similar growth in mobile disbursement interest in the B2B space as well, especially as more millennial and Gen Z workers join firms' staff. These younger employees expect faster payment experiences, but mobile-enabled B2B disbursements have proven to be relatively complex.

The following Deep Dive explores the mobile disbursements landscape, the factors influencing increased demand for B2B and B2C mobile disbursements and the roadblocks standing in the way of widespread adoption.

The mobile disbursements landscape

Consumers are turning to their smartphones for everything from retail purchases to booking air travel and hotels to requesting refunds and other disbursements from online merchants. Mobile has quickly become the backbone of consumers' financial lives as well, with a recent survey finding that 79 percent of U.S. consumers now use mobile payment apps. Millennials are among the top financial app users: 94 percent of surveyed millennials use P2P apps like Venmo and Zelle.

There is also a growing appetite for mobile apps that can receive instant disbursements for a variety of use cases, including receiving rebates and settling insurance claims. Seventy percent of consumers stated that they would use instant payment solutions for these payouts if they had the option.

It follows that businesses and other entities would want to enable access to mobile disbursements, but implementation can be difficult. The Department of Education requires universities to provide access to several disbursement options for students, which does not prohibit universities from issuing mobile disbursements but does keep check payments as the default payout option if students are unaware of the available alternatives. Universities looking to implement mobile disbursements must also find payment partners that can support them, but they are unlikely to do this if students have not requested it.

The growing number of younger users who rely on mobile offerings for their daily tasks is pushing some universities to experiment with these payout options, with 36 American universities currently utilizing a mobile tuition payments program that offers refunds via mobile wallet. The availability and access to such solutions is still limited, however, as the Department of Education has not yet required universities to offer them.

Retailers are exploring mobile disbursements as a way to connect with their tech-savvy consumer bases. Such solutions would allow shoppers to receive instant rebates right on their phones, though these offerings are not yet widely available.

Universities, retailers and other entities sending disbursements to consumers have guidance on where and why they should integrate mobile disbursements. They also have the infrastructures to support these payments. Businesses looking to send digital disbursements to other businesses are finding the transition to be a little more difficult, however.

B2B payment innovation struggles

Mobile B2B disbursements are a growing interest for a number of firms, but most businesses still have their payment processes firmly rooted in checks. One report found that companies sent approximately 22 billion checks per year, for example. Businesses are clinging to these payments for multiple reasons, the main one being how these processes are set up. B2B payments often require complex reviews in which several employees must check invoices and recipient identities, among other things, before payments are sent. Businesses have long been able to receive digital payments, but many of the processes involved in sending money and making payouts are still paper-based.

Ample businesses are currently confronting these outdated processes as the spread of COVID-19 shunted most employees into remote work from their homes, making managing paper bills, checks and invoices challenging. Digital or mobile disbursement methods would make this part of the payment cycle much shorter and easier, preventing them from having to track down payments. It is worth noting that businesses integrate proper authentication processes into their disbursement processes, however.

Mobile disbursements are becoming critical for both B2B and B2C companies. The entities that can adapt alongside rising global smartphone penetration levels – and those that leave outdated check disbursements behind – are the ones who will dominate in both fields.
