WHAT'S INSIDE

he COVID-19 pandemic and its economic impacts are still gripping the world, and companies — especially small to mid-sized businesses (SMBs) — are experiencing more financial hardship as consumers remain cautious of spending money on anything but necessities. Consumers' wariness is understandable, however, as the number of United States individuals below the poverty line has grown by 8 million since May.

Such financial distress often comes with numerous consequences. These consumers can find it difficult to retain their bank accounts because of checking account deposit minimums and expanding overdraft fees, for example, ultimately limiting their access to financial products. Other reports have predicted that the number of unbanked individuals will grow due to the health crisis's impacts. This would buck a downward trend over the past several years: Just 5.4 percent of American households were unbanked in 2019. Other countries may likewise find their citizens contributing to a rise in the global total of unbanked or underbanked individuals, which stood at approximately 1.7 billion in 2017.

Financial institutions (FIs) and third-party service providers can take steps to include these consumers, such as supporting mobile or digital disbursement solutions that do not require the use of bank accounts. The pandemic is pushing financial players to fast-track the development of these tools, especially because many unbanked individuals qualify for government disbursements or loans. This means FIs, FinTechs, payment providers and others should closely examine mobile or peer-to-peer (P2P) payment tools that can enable instant disbursements outside of traditional financial channels.

Around the disbursements world

Digital access to unbanked consumers is especially critical now, as the COVID-19 pandemic is set to increase their ranks, according to a recent Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. (FDIC) study. The study found that the number of unbanked consumers in the U.S. had been declining for the past several years but that the economic stresses of the continuing health crisis are set to bump more individuals into this category. The report predicted that the pandemic's effects on U.S. consumers will likely mirror those experienced after the 2008 recession — when job losses and income reductions led to more unemployment and unbanked consumers. Keeping these consumers engaged in the broader financial system is thus essential.

Fls that support digital and mobile payment tools could help these consumers access financial solutions without using traditional accounts, but many Fls must address age-old challenges before they can roll out such tools. Numerous legacy Fls are still tangled up in outdated and complex banking infrastructures, Drew Edwards, CEO of instant payment service Ingo Money, said in a recent PYMNTS interview. Many of these banks have simply added new tools and services on top of their old systems for decades, he explained, which makes it difficult to swiftly innovate. FinTechs and third-party services with newer infrastructures and digital payment solutions are in many cases better-suited to serving unbanked consumers' needs than legacy banks, a developing reality that could lead to significant changes in the financial ecosystem.

Some regions' banks have been faster to adopt digital tools and to upgrade their infrastructures than others. Fls inside the European Union, for example, have been making these changes for the past two years after passing new regulations that require them to share data with FinTechs and other third-party players to foster a more connected digital banking space. Instant payment solutions' continued development is a top priority for the region's Fls during the pandemic, though these innovations must also be guarded by robust cybersecurity measures, said Alexandra Maniati, director of cybersecurity and innovation for the European Banking Federation (EBF), in a recent PYMNTS interview. Failing to set up rigorous digital identity checks will give fraudsters more opportunities to steal consumers' payment details, especially as instant payment tools become more widely available around the globe.

How Phlatbed is leveraging mobile to ease unbanked disbursement challenges

Unbanked consumers now have access to more money management tools than ever before, but the COVID-19 pandemic has thrown a wrench into their ability to utilize them at scale. Alternative solutions designed to help consumers without bank accounts move money are going only so far during the continuing health crisis. Sending wage disbursements to prepaid cards can help these individuals access their money faster, for example, but most of these cards have preexisting limits, meaning that even when unbanked consumers are expecting disbursements, the wages cannot go onto cards that have already hit their maximums. Finding other ways to get money to these consumers is critical and may involve thinking about moving money differently. In this month's Feature Story (p. 8), Alani Kuye, CEO of on-demand moving platform Phlatbed, explained how the pandemic is affecting unbanked workers' ability to collect funds in a timely fashion and why utilizing mobile and instant payments may be the solution.

Deep Dive: How supporting mobile and instant disbursements can keep unbanked consumers digitally engaged

The COVID-19 pandemic is reshaping the global economy, pushing millions below the poverty line and limiting their access to traditional bank accounts and the services that they offer. This means many of these consumers may be unable to meet the minimum balances necessary to maintain their checking accounts, and many could go unbanked. One recent study found that 29 percent of unbanked consumers cited minimum balance requirements as the main deterrent to their obtaining bank accounts, for example. Many unbanked individuals remain wary or even uninterested in traditional bank accounts, however, meaning financial players must find other ways to keep them engaged and transacting during the health crisis. This month's Deep Dive (p. 19) examines the pandemic's impacts on the unbanked population, its impact on their participation in a digital financial ecosystem and how supporting instant disbursements via mobile wallets and other mobile tools can keep them engaged.

EXECUTIVE INSIGHT

What is the potential of using mobile wallets for providing faster access to disbursements for unbanked consumers?

"At Ingo, we believe in and promote 'payee choice' for all consumers, including unbanked consumers, and for payments in both directions. ... As the pandemic accelerates all consumers' digital adoption and spurs a greater necessity for faster access to funds, consumers [who] were used to transacting physically at stores using cash are being driven into the digital world, where choice becomes even more relevant. The cornerstone of payee choice is to seamlessly make all relevant account types and payment methods available 24/7 when the consumer or small business is making the choice.

There is no doubt mobile wallets are already relevant and picking up steam, thanks to the pandemic. PayPal alone has almost 300 million registered users, many of [whom] would be considered unbanked or underbanked. This is leading more of our clients to instruct us to 'turn on' PayPal and other wallets in their customer experiences because it is relevant.

Often these mobile wallets are more cost-effective for the corporates and the FinTech companies they partner with. For example, PayPal, unlike the banks, has built-in methods available to verify identities. With bank accounts, authentication usually requires engaging costly third-party identify verification and account ownership services. But with PayPal, a server-to-server exchange of information allows Ingo to richly authenticate with organic data, eliminating third-party costs. Furthermore, our direct integration and settlement relationship obviates the need to route through third-party rails, also reducing costs.

We see mobile wallets like PayPal as a significant and material component in the future of disbursements and payee choice for all consumers and small businesses, including the unbanked segment. Rather than think of people and businesses as banked or unbanked, I think the new terminology should be 'digital versus analog' transactors."

Phlatbed: Why Mobile Is Key To Moving Disbursements To The Unbanked

The number of unbanked consumers was on a downward curve before the COVID-19 pandemic hit and caused widespread financial distress. Now that number is expected to grow as the economic downturn makes it even more difficult for the unbanked to save the funds they need to meet checking account minimums and enter the banking world.

Getting disbursements to unbanked consumers — especially those working in the gig economy — is therefore a top priority for government agencies and companies. Managing wage disbursements to unbanked gig workers must be done with careful consideration of how the costs or frustrations inherent in some methods could affect these individuals, said Alani Kuye, CEO of on-demand moving platform Phlatbed.

Phlatbed offers flexible help to move items to homes or apartments — or even to pick up large-scale items like furniture from retail stores — and currently has approximately 30,000 active drivers across the U.S. on its platform. Kuye explained in a recent interview with PYMNTS why the pandemic is making it difficult for the company's unbanked drivers to collect disbursements and described how utilizing devices such as smartphones and digital payment solutions may help in this area.

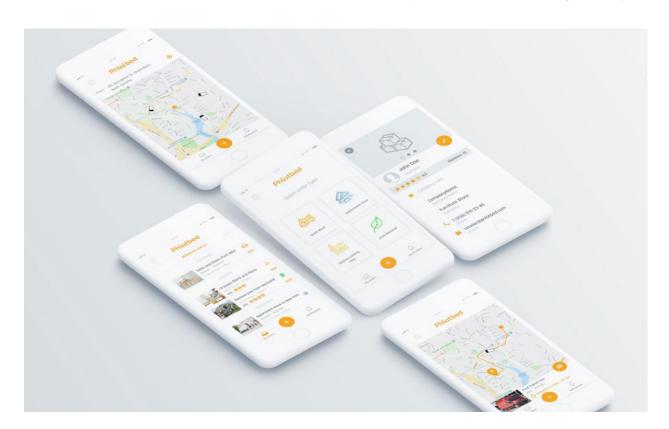

Breaking the unbanked banking loop

Sending disbursements to the unbanked has gotten easier in recent years with the advance of digital tools and alternative services designed to draw them into the digital financial ecosystem, Kuye said. Unbanked drivers could use these services as a jumping-off point to save funds, but the ongoing pandemic has dissipated their ability to do so.

"Now, under normal circumstances, pre-COVID-19, what was happening was those who started there ended up transitioning out of what I will call the lower banking tier into a regular account," he said. "But with the pandemic, what happened was a lot more [individuals] stayed within that phase, but they were doing more jobs."

Doing more jobs means earning more money in theory, Kuye continued, but these funds have nowhere to go for drivers lacking bank accounts, as most alternative solutions have limits on how much money can be placed on them at any given time. A limit of $1,000 would mean that unbanked drivers racking up $2,000 in earnings would therefore have to spend $1,000 to make room for those additional funds or else leave them waiting in escrow, effectively slashing any benefit of picking up extra work. Options are available to try to mitigate these frustrations, but the other pressing problem is cost, Kuye explained.

"We can get checks out, but we are going to have to charge them to do that," he said. "Then you send the check out; it will not get there for a day or two [and if] you have to overnight it, that is $20 [lost] there. I mean, you have eaten half of the drivers' revenue just to get them a physical check."

Disbursing pay to unbanked or lower-income drivers at speed — and without high fees — is where mobile tools could come into play. Expanding smartphone use for disbursements could mitigate many of the problems unbanked drivers currently experience but might also mean thinking about disbursements — and banking itself — quite differently.

Mobile and the instant payment question

Most members of the gig economy are reliant on their mobile devices to pick up work, and Phlatbed is no exception. The on-demand moving platform allows drivers and consumers to book and coordinate jobs via its mobile app, where drivers can also keep track of their earnings and other metrics. Funneling payments through the company's app is a natural next step — and several gig platforms such as Uber and Lyft have already done so, offering instant payments that rely on mobile-optimized wallets held in-app. Such capabilities have clear benefits for drivers, but it is also important to consider who is actually bearing their cost, Kuye cautioned.

"We are looking at those in-app instant payments as well, but we have to make sure [they are done with] the right partner — not only the technology, but also the volume and bargaining power," he said. "We can do that today; it is just [that] for every million dollars, you are paying about $200,000 for instant transactions. The value proposition ... is just money you are leaving on the table for convenience that most of your labor pool may not necessarily see the value in, because it's coming out of their pocket. It's not going to come out of ours. It's going to come out of theirs."

Getting this cost and convenience ratio balanced is critical, but it bears noting that many individuals in the gig economy are already expecting payments via mobile and not via traditional banking channels. Shifting to meet that expectation for instant disbursements — especially in a way that could coax the unbanked into the larger financial world — could therefore take gig economy platforms into some unexpected places. Uber, for example, has floated the idea of becoming an actual bank — something Phlatbed is also considering.

"It is definitely not off the table," Kuye admitted. "Right now, I've got 33,000-plus people that we are doing this for, so right out of the gate, you have 33,000-plus customers. That's not bad, [so] it is definitely not off the table. I think we will see more gig platforms go that route because the key metric — [the] key data point — is 'Who owns the customer?' In this case, we own the customer, and we own the drivers."

Phlatbed's disbursement offerings and banking possibilities will largely depend on how expectations for money movement continue to evolve in the course of the ongoing pandemic — not just for the unbanked, but for the wider workforce as well.

NEWS & TRENDS

COVID-19 AND THE UNBANKED

Pandemic to cause spike in number of unbanked Americans

The ongoing COVID-19 pandemic is likely to increase the number of U.S. consumers without bank accounts, according to a new FDIC report. This figure had been decreasing in recent years, hitting a low of 5.4 percent of American households in 2019 — the smallest share measured since the FDIC began tracking it in 2009. Pandemic-driven unemployment could be one factor behind the anticipated spike, which could ultimately determine how many consumers require alternative payment or disbursement solutions to those offered by traditional FIs.

The FDIC's recent report on how the health crisis is affecting unbanked consumers does not highlight specific reasons as to why their numbers are likely to jump, but it does note that its past research has tied job and income losses to the loss of bank accounts and participation in the broader financial world. It stated that its research surrounding the Great Recession supports this assertion.

P2P use rises as unbanked worries grow

Expanding support for mobile banking tools

– especially peer-to-peer (P2P) payment
applications – could help FIs and others

boost unbanked consumers' participation in the financial ecosystem. Third-party app use has already grown steadily over the past few years, and P2P tools also do not require bank accounts. An FDIC report found that 31 percent of U.S. households utilized P2P applications last year, for example, and that mobile banking usage overall climbed between 2017 and 2019.

These trends indicate that mobile devices are factoring more heavily into the banking world and that more consumers are becoming able to make transactions or receive disbursements without the involvement of legacy Fls. This could give third-party P2P or instant payment service providers a leg up on the competition as they work to better engage consumers across mobile channels.

Banks contemplate digital, P2P payment rules

Fls are aware that they need to make some changes in response to the current financial climate. The pandemic's impact on banks' relationships with customers has pushed many to digitize their operations and examine offerings that could better serve the unbanked, said Kelly Switt, senior director of financial services industry strategy, ecosystem and strategic partnerships for financial technology firm Red Hat, in a recent PYMNTS interview. Third-party FinTechs and P2P payment service providers in particular have been tapping digital solutions for years to provide unbanked consumers with better access to financial tools, she explained, but the pandemic has pushed even central banks and legacy Fls to consider more inclusive online solutions.

Switt said P2P apps have been growing steadily more popular in recent years and are becoming key financial tools for unbanked consumers. The most recent study by the World Bank concerning this claimed that approximately 1.7 billion individuals worldwide lacked bank accounts, and the portion of mobile or P2P service users has continued to rise since then. Fls will thus need to reexamine how they are utilizing these tools and reassess how their operations can benefit unbanked consumers.

SHRM crafts new mobile app for unbanked payments

Most unbanked individuals have access to smartphones, and these devices are becoming more essential to making and receiving payments for all consumers. The Society for Human Resource Management (SHRM), a human resources membership association, recently announced that it would roll out a new app to deliver payments and disbursements to employees via instant payments. A third-party payments provider would underpin the solution, which also allows recipients to receive funds via prepaid debit cards.

The new solution aims to make it easier for workers to receive funds, addressing the growing ranks of unbanked consumers and remote workers during the pandemic. These conditions make traditional payment methods more costly for firms and more time-consuming for employees, leading many to seek digital or mobile solutions to receive their funds.

CHANGING DISBURSEMENTS TRENDS

Fed cites need for interoperability in advance of real-time payments

The U.S. Federal Reserve is also seeking to expand real-time payments' availability to consumers and businesses ahead of the launch of its FedNow real-time payments network, which is set for 2023 or 2024. Fed officials have said that the agency will work in the interim to ensure that its network can interact with other systems and payment services, such as the Real-Time Payments (RTP) network run by The Clearing House (TCH).

Such interoperability is key to making sure FedNow maintains the transparency and ubiquity needed to work as intended, Ken Montgomery, Boston Federal Reserve chief operating officer and FedNow program executive, said in a recent PYMNTS interview. Failing to achieve this connectivity will lead to a lack of coordination in the services banks, businesses and consumers can access, resulting in many of the same compatibility issues that real-time payments aim to solve.

IRS still struggles with stimulus checks to unbanked consumers

Many government agencies — including the U.S. Internal Revenue Service (IRS) — still utilize paper checks or manual processes to send disbursements, even as support for real-time payments expands. Reliance on these legacy methods can make it difficult for these agencies to reach unbanked or underbanked consumers who may be eligible for certain payments. The IRS is still attempting to disburse Coronavirus Aid, Relief and Economic Security (CARES) Act stimulus payments to unbanked and underbanked individuals almost seven months after the agency began sending out these funds. The agency has since extended the deadline for these consumers to upload tax returns or other documentation that would help it identify them and send out their funds.

Unbanked and underbanked consumers typically do not file tax returns because they often fall below the required income threshold to do so, and they have limited options for depositing funds. The IRS cannot send disbursements to these individuals via direct deposit, for example, and is often forced to send out payments via paper checks, causing additional funding delays for these consumers.

Stimulus disbursements increase prepaid debit adoption

Prepaid debit cards are another disbursement option that could edge out paper checks. These cards can be loaded with ready-to-spend funds and sent to unbanked individuals, eliminating the lags that accompany paper checks. The IRS sent prepaid cards to roughly 4 million Americans during the first round of stimulus funding, and these cards could see expanded use if the federal government approves a second round of aid.

Prepaid cards could prove ideal for underbanked individuals, as they allow consumers to withdraw cash from ATMs and can also be deposited into online accounts. This gives consumers more flexibility to manage the pandemic's impacts with their preferred payment tools and methods.

Outdated infrastructure challenges continue for FIs

One persistent challenge preventing traditional banks from offering mobile and instant payments to unbanked consumers is the struggle to upgrade decades-old banking infrastructure. Banks are reluctant to ditch their legacy systems because doing so would require restructuring many facets of their operations, Drew Edwards, CEO of Ingo Money, explained during a recent interview with PYMNTS. More processes are piled on the longer they wait to overhaul their infrastructure, however, making it more costly and complicated to reconfigure their systems over time.

Fls are also running out of time to make this shift, especially because unbanked or underbanked consumers require speedy disbursements during the pandemic. This means the unbanked may turn to competitors such as FinTechs and other third parties over legacy banks to fill their financial needs, said Edwards.

MOBILE AND INSTANT PAYMENTS

Mobile use continues to grow in Latin America

Using FinTechs or third-party service providers for disbursements instead of legacy Fls is already an established pattern in the Latin American market, where smartphone penetration is rising but access to bank accounts is comparatively low. Consumers in Latin America also tend to be more active when using their mobile banking or money apps than those in other regions, according to one recent report. Nearly 48 percent of such accounts were considered active. which the study defined as consumers who opened and used their apps to make transactions or receive disbursements within a 90-day period. The global average is almost 35 percent.

The report also found that government agencies across Latin America are likely to use these apps to send disbursements to citizens who qualify for pandemic-related financial assistance or loans rather than legacy banking channels. Paraguay's government can send money to the region's "informal workers" via several mobile apps, for example.

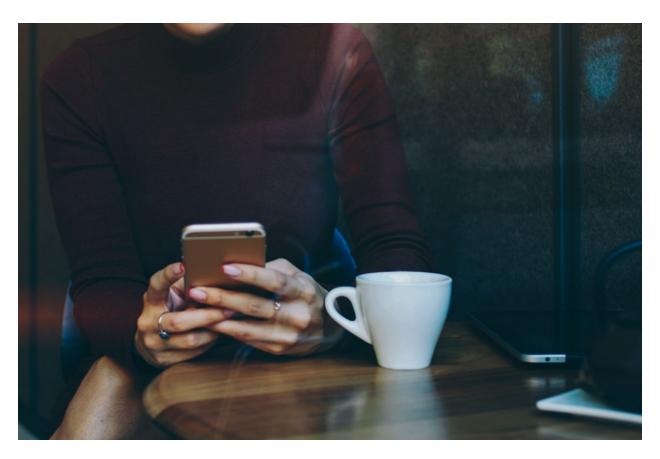

Pandemic drives instant payment growth in the EU

Crisis-driven changes to individuals' and businesses' work and spending habits are also spurring government bodies in other regions to reexamine instant and mobile payments. Regulatory and banking bodies in the EU are spotlighting instant payments development as a top priority due to these recent shifts. This includes analyzing cloud-based technologies that could help build out and support instant payments infrastructure at greater scale, Alexandra Maniati, director of cybersecurity and innovation for the EBF, explained in a recent PYMNTS interview.

Cloud-based support would allow FIs to streamline these processes and add security measures like enhanced digital identity solutions as fraud becomes an increasing concern, she said. These tools could also help banks eliminate persistent procedural inefficiencies, such as the need for paper-based signatures or other manual checks that can stall payments.

Instant payments could drive loyalty for US consumers

Instant payments adoption is growing more slowly in other markets, including the U.S. A recent PYMNTS report found that the nation's consumers are still interested in the method, however. It revealed that supporting instant payments could ultimately keep consumers and businesses loyal, with 61 percent of the former stating that they would be more likely to continue relationships with firms that offered fee-free instant payments than with those not offering the method. It also showed that 17.3 percent were even willing to pay fees for quicker access to their funds.

There is still room for instant payments growth in the U.S. market, as its consumers receive about 14 percent of their disbursements via instant methods each year. The pandemic in particular appears to be boosting financial players' interest in adopting these methods, especially as keeping consumers loyal becomes a more prominent focus

Fraudsters follow the instant payments flood

The new focus on instant payments and their benefits is encouraging, but government agencies and merchants must also ensure that they are monitoring how this shift is affecting fraud. Instant payments are still nascent enough that they are not yet considered a high-profile target for fraudsters - but bad actors will eventuallv catch on, warned Drew Edwards, CEO of Ingo Money, during a recent PYMNTS interview. Higher fraud levels are already trickling into certain platforms that provide instant payments, he added, including P2P mobile apps, which often lack the robust security measures attached to legacy banking channels

Consumers and merchants alike must therefore adjust to these developing fraud forms. Many consumers are used to keeping an eye out for fraud in the days after writing checks or making card-based payments, for example, but instant payments reduce their ability to do so — which is likely to make them an increasingly appealing target for fraudsters. This means that developing security measures that are as instant as the payments they guard should be a top priority for the industry.

DEEP DIVE

WHY INSTANT, MOBILE DISBURSEMENTS ARE KEY TO KEEPING UNBANKED CONSUMERS FINANCIALLY ENGAGED

eeping unbanked consumers transacting and connected to the broader financial world has grown especially tricky over the past few years as cash use dips and digital payments rise. Even paying at fast food restaurants — many having adopted technologies and point-of-sale terminals that favor cards over cash — can prove difficult for the unbanked, and the pandemic is adding pressure to establishments to go cashless.

The number of consumers who are classified as unbanked or underbanked is growing for the first time in several years as the health crisis drives widespread job losses and lowers incomes globally. Many individuals lack emergency savings on which to fall back, with 35.8 percent of all American households stating in one recent study that they were not saving for emergencies. Lacking access to bank accounts is making it more challenging to save.

Being unbanked can also bar consumers from accessing significant digital benefits, such as receiving direct deposits and other disbursements, instantly paying their bills or gaining real-time spending insights. The pandemic is prompting the rapid expansion and adoption of digital and mobile banking, however, opening new doors for financial players as they work to connect with these individuals. The following Deep Dive examines the ongoing health crisis's effects on the unbanked and underbanked as well as how digital and mobile adoption could enable these consumers to send and receive disbursements.

COVID-19 and unbanked consumers

The pandemic is causing financial impacts that rival those experienced during the 2008 recession and other widespread economic crises, leaving individuals and businesses struggling to make ends meet and causing a rise in unbanked consumers. More than 100,000 SMBs have permanently closed their doors since the start of the pandemic, and 8 million Americans have fallen below the poverty line during that time. Fls and other financial players confronting these new economic realities are shifting their focus to assess how best to engage with unbanked consumers as their ranks grow.

Unbanked consumers do not have many of the tools banks and financial players typically use to disburse funds, and they often rely solely on cash because they lack bank accounts. Many FIs also have minimum balance requirements to maintain checking and even savings accounts, with one study finding that 29 percent of unbanked consumers did not open such accounts because they did not feel that they could meet these requirements. Banks have been tackling these issues for several years, but the health crisis has prompted organizations such as the American Bankers Association to recommend that U.S. banks make low-cost accounts more freely available to unbanked consumers.

This lack of bank account access has deeper financial impacts. It often means unbanked consumers are likely to choose cash over other methods when they receive even routine disbursements like work compensation. Three-quarters of consumers who are currently unbanked reported having minimal or no interest in creating traditional bank accounts — preferring instead to handle their financial needs outside the banking world.

Handling cash has become severely difficult during the pandemic. Lingering concerns over accepting physical payments have led numerous stores to discourage or limit cash's use, and the number of agencies that want to send out disbursements to customers digitally rather than through the mail via paper checks has also grown.

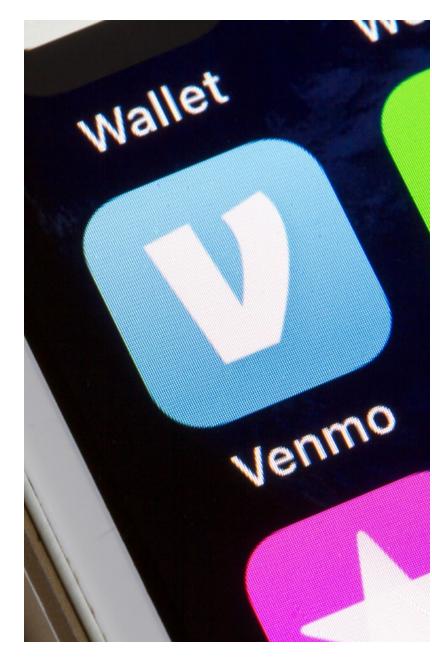

One digital disbursement method that appears to be catching on with both banked and unbanked consumers is mobile wallets, however. Such tools may provide FIs and other financial players with the opportunity they need to engage unbanked consumers as cash use shrinks.

The mobile opportunity

Cash, checks and even plastic cards are seeing less use during the pandemic compared to methods that rely more on digital or mobile devices. Mobile is becoming the primary way for a rising share of banked consumers to interact with their bank accounts, for example, growing from 15.6 percent in 2017 to 34 percent in 2019. The pandemic is accelerating this growth, with new mobile banking registrations ballooning 200 percent in April, and this trend will likely continue through year's end.

It is important for FIs to note that most unbanked individuals have smartphones, even though they may still be wary of traditional bank accounts. Eighty-one percent of U.S. consumers owned smartphones as of 2019, and the use of mobile solutions that do not rely on bank account access — including mobile wallets — is also increasing. Thirty-one percent of U.S. consumers are now using some kind of P2P mobile application, such as Venmo.

Mobile wallets can receive and store payments inside their apps, which could provide a significant benefit to unbanked consumers who must transition away from cash even without access to traditional banking services. Determining how to accommodate these mobile disbursements — and do so instantly — will be a key consideration for financial players during the next year as they work to bring unbanked consumers into the digital banking fold.

Ingo Money is the instant money company. Founded in 2001 with a mission to digitize the paper check, its industry-first disbursements marketplace enables businesses and banks to disburse instant, safe-to-spend electronic funds from any source to an account that a consumer or business chooses, with network reach to more than 4 billion debit, prepaid, credit, private label credit and mobile wallet accounts. This transformation of traditional payments helps businesses reduce cost and delays while dramatically improving the consumer experience by shifting choice to the recipient of a payment.

Ingo Money has funded over $20 billion in transactions across all of its use cases since launch and completed the first push payment transaction in the United States in 2012. Headquartered in Alpharetta, Georgia, Ingo employs 250 professionals and serves some of the largest brands in North America.
