WHAT'S INSIDE

Government agencies and lawmakers have had to act quickly during the pandemic, managing the medical, personal and financial challenges that have arisen for United States citizens. One out of every three Americans said they had experienced a loss of income, for example, and this loss can be crippling for consumers who live paycheck to paycheck or have little savings. Approximately 40 percent of U.S. consumers cannot pay for a $400 emergency, meaning that the pandemic could push these consumers further down the economic ladder.

This all means that the payments individuals expect from the government and corporate entities such as insurance companies must be made with significant speed so individuals can pay their urgent bills. Sending and receiving these disbursements with the necessary speed may prove challenging for government groups that often rely on paper checks or other batch-based methods to move money to their constituents, however. Paper checks cost about $2.50 or more each when all fees are considered and this can add up for government agencies disbursing millions of them. The Illinois state government sent out $1.3 billion in check disbursements in 2019, for example, and Utah is expected to pay out $72 billion in one-time check payments by the end of the year. Federal agencies are struggling not only with costs but also with the practicalities of sending out paper stimulus checks to individuals as stipulated by the Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (CARES) Act. Low-income or unbanked consumers have had an especially hard time receiving these funds, despite being some of the most financially vulnerable.

The pressure is on for these government agencies to upgrade their legacy infrastructures to facilitate a modernized, digital disbursements experience. Moving to digital, instant disbursements could have a noted effect on citizens' financial health by enabling improved security and a potentially greater chance of economic recovery.

Around the disbursements world

The stimulus payment application deadline for individuals that do not need to file tax returns, typically due to low incomes, passed on Nov. 21, meaning that many low-income families were the last to receive stimulus money from the U.S. Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Transitioning from paper checks to digital payments may therefore be critical for the IRS and similar agencies if they wish to mitigate pandemic-induced financial distress — especially as talks of a second round of such checks continue to occur within the U.S. government.

Governments and nongovernment agencies alike are struggling to meet expectations for increased speeds, however. Ninety percent of consumers prefer getting paid quickly than getting paid slowly — a feeling also shared by businesses. This does not mean that businesses or consumers have the option to receive their money swiftly, explained Sherri Haymond, executive vice president of digital partnerships for card network Mastercard. Approximately $30 trillion annually is still sent to consumers and to businesses via paper checks, reducing payment speeds and frustrating recipients. The network has therefore partnered with instant payment provider Ingo Money to bring more digital payments choice to top U.S. banks and corporations with the goal that both businesses and consumers will have faster access to their funds.

Part of the challenge in increasing instant payment adoption may be due to a communication gap. Recent PYMNTS research found that while 58.4 percent of consumers claim they receive nongovernment disbursements through methods that are not instant, the payors of those disbursements state they only make 45.3 percent of disbursements through noninstant methods. Dissolving the gap between what consumers and payors each consider to be instant is therefore a top challenge for payment providers, especially as consumers begin to expect speedier disbursements from businesses. Failing to meet those expectations could detrimentally impact businesses, as consumers are likely to look for competing companies that can fulfill those needs.

For more on these stories and other disbursements headlines, read the Tracker's News and Trends section (p. 13).

How government agencies can tackle disbursement challenges with payment variety

The pandemic has changed how money should move, putting the pressure on government agencies to quickly send out stimulus relief and business loan disbursements to citizens. These agencies must be sure that they can send money both to consumers who expect to see money appear quickly in their online bank accounts while not neglecting the needs of underbanked or unbanked consumers who may not have access to such tools. In this month's Feature Story (p. 8), Linda Jun, senior policy counsel for consumer financial advocacy group Americans for Financial Reform, explains why agencies must support multiple ways of sending funds to financially vulnerable individuals while taking the changing payment needs of consumers at varying socioeconomic levels into account.

Deep Dive: Government agencies and the pandemic-driven push for instant payment adoption

Millions of consumers are still attempting to get their heads above water after the pandemic's effects left them out of work or hunting for new sources of income. This is putting pressure on entities such as governmental agencies to modernize their disbursement processes, as most are still making large shares of these payments with paper checks. This means that consumers could wait months to receive Social Security or stimulus check money from the government, for example, further worsening their overall financial health. This month's Deep Dive (p. 17) analyzes how the pandemic is exacerbating the existing struggles attached to paper checks used in government disbursements and what this means as more consumers grow accustomed to digital transactions' speed in their everyday lives.

EXECUTIVE INSIGHT

Late disbursements by paper checks can lead to financial struggles, especially for low-income or unbanked consumers. How can government agencies help provide a better disbursement experience?

“While the government endeavored to offer relief through stimulus check distribution earlier this year, the challenges and delays [it] faced getting funds to the recipients only underscored the need for [it] to modernize [its] payments infrastructure. Sixty percent of Americans are now living paycheck to paycheck, so even the smallest delay is felt.

Those who did receive paper checks — an instrument ripe for fraud itself — not only had to wait extra weeks or months for sorely needed funds to arrive but then had to physically handle them and often had to pay to access the funds. While an improvement over checks, ACH is still a slower, batch-based system. Many of the ACH payments ended up failing, unfortunately, with the government’s lack of current account information, again causing further delays [for] the intended recipients.

It became glaringly clear to all that the largest payor of funds can do better as these scenarios played out in an unprecedented year — payments can arrive faster and more conveniently to help consumers and businesses pay their bills on time ... and it can happen in real-time to the account a recipient chooses and authenticates.

Modernizing means to deliver government disbursements in real-time and with choice, making all relevant account types and payment methods available in a 24/7 omnichannel experience. [There are] more than 50 million government checks still issued annually, [so] some of the biggest use cases with the largest need for modern payments would likely include IRS tax refunds, VA benefits and FEMA payments, in addition to ad-hoc stimulus relief.

The government’s undertaking is certainly not easy, but [it is] aware of the need and making headway in 2020. If there is such thing as a silver lining for this year, at least within payments, it is that both industry and our government’s modernization work has picked up steam and is full speed ahead.”

How Government Agencies Can Find A Disbursement Method Middle Ground

The pandemic has broadly impacted money movement and a new sense of urgency, from retailers seeking faster ways to pay suppliers to insurance firms adopting digital methods to issue claims payouts to waiting recipients. Government agencies fall among the cohort of institutions that need to disburse funds with more speed than usual, but they're tasked with sending stimulus checks and business loans to the financially vulnerable, making the stakes higher for those that fail to quickly respond to these pandemic-driven changes.

Government agencies can struggle to move funds to waiting recipients with the necessary speed. Part of this is because these agencies are not used to managing multiple payment types, said Linda Jun, senior policy counsel for consumer financial advocacy group Americans for Financial Reform. Many government agencies are simply used to doing things one way, she explained, rather than supporting the increasing variety of disbursement methods preferred among consumers of different demographics that require aid.

"The IRS is ready to deal with direct deposit if you have a regular bank account and they are ready to deal with paper checks, [but] they are not used to dealing with [more] payment methods on a widespread scale," Jun said in a recent PYMNTS interview. "I have noticed, with a lot of these systems, with [the pandemic], that available systems are either entirely internet-based or completely old-school, like paper. We need to push the government to do more to reach those places where neither of those is an option."

Relying on outdated disbursement methods can potentially lead to financial harm, especially as rising unemployment figures and economic fallout is still occurring. Government agencies must find disbursement methods that can reach consumers who exist in that gap for their relief to be effective.

The digital and paper-based balance

Part of the issue is that government agencies need to send money to individuals in every economic or social bracket and different consumer demographics have wildly different payment expectations. Many consumers are now expecting their payments to arrive digitally and much more quickly to their bank accounts.

Agencies must deliver money to individuals with the speed they are expecting, but they must also support disbursement methods that can quickly get money to consumers who do not have access to bank accounts or digital tools, Jun explained. Many agencies are still utilizing paper checks to do this, but that often means consigning more financially vulnerable consumers to waiting for their money longer — and that is if all of the details are right and the money is being sent to the correct destination, Jun said.

“There is also the concern about making sure that paper checks actually arrive and reach the intended recipient,” Jun said. “I think there are natural delays with paper that — for certain people — is going to cause more of a [financial] hardship.”

One tool that could potentially be used to meld digital and paper-based offerings is the use of prepaid cards, she explained. These cards do not require bank accounts and can be used right away, meaning that underbanked consumers will not have to wait to cash paper checks to gain access to their funds. Other digitally connected tools, such as mobile wallets, could also offer similar benefits in this space, she said, especially as the number of Americans who are utilizing smartphones is growing steadily, even though many of these users may not have traditional bank accounts. There are still several factors to analyze before mobile disbursements can be widely applied, however.

“[Mobile is] worth exploring,” Jun said. “I think a lot of concerns with mobile is just how they are regulated and how those funds are protected, both with fraud and with deposits and that sort of thing. I think there are a lot of questions outstanding to make sure that the money and the use of the mobile wallet itself is adequately protecting people, but in a world where those protections could be implemented the way they should be, then [mobile disbursement] is definitely worth exploring.”

It is crucial for government agencies and regulators to analyze how mobile and other emerging payment tools are truly being utilized before they are implemented as part of their disbursement systems, she noted. Failing to do so could lead to even more financial harm if the proper precautions are not taken.

Disbursements and the innovation question

There are creative financial solutions being developed to help bring money more quickly to vulnerable groups, Jun noted, but regulators must be careful with how they handle these developments.

“The danger I see within the word ‘innovation’ that I have seen in the financial space is using innovation as a shield to get out of regulation or to say, ‘our product is so new and shiny and it does not fall into any bucket,’” Jun explained. “Just because something is now on an app [that] does not mean it is totally new. ... Those should all be regulated and supervised appropriately.”

Properly vetting potential new solutions in this space will be key for government agencies in the future as they look for the best possible ways to connect with consumers of every economic status. Many of the old methods to which these agencies are clinging are quickly becoming outdated, however, and these institutions will need to move to strike the proper balance.

NEWS & TRENDS

INSTANT PAYMENTS AND GOVERNMENT DISBURSEMENTS

How the pandemic could drive the IRS to adopt instant disbursements

The pandemic appears to have highlighted just how many government entities are reliant upon paper checks or other legacy methods when it comes to sending out funds — especially to more vulnerable groups. The deadline for low-income families to sign up to receive the stimulus checks promised by the CARES Act only recently passed, for example, meaning that some of these consumers are still waiting to receive their funds.

Many low-income families, which are especially financially vulnerable to the pandemic's impacts, are therefore some of the last to get relief payments. This is prompting many within the government to consider alternative disbursement methods — especially as discussions of a second stimulus package concern legislators. Instant payments through digital tools could reach recipients much more quickly, mitigating some of the negative financial impacts they might have experienced due to the health crisis. The pandemic might as a result accelerate the adoption of instant payments for governmental entities.

CSU Bakersfield taps mobile disbursements for students' financial aid

Another use case for digital tool adoption that the pandemic may encourage is student aid disbursements. California State University (CSU) Bakersfield recently partnered with a mobile payments provider to enable digital access for students to quickly receive their government or other financial aid. The partnership comes after 32 percent of CSU Bakersfield students reported some measure of difficulty with existing disbursement options when receiving their refunds. These issues included late disbursements, which caused inconveniences when it came time for students to pay for classes or learning materials. The sequence of events led the university to transition to mobile disbursements, allowing students to digitally manage and quickly collect their disbursements into a mobile app account. CSU Bakersfield is retaining students' ability to collect these disbursements via paper checks if they so choose, however.

Mastercard teams up with Ingo Money to help close the instant payments gap

Both businesses and consumers are reporting a greater need for speedy payments in the wake of the global health crisis, with 90 percent of consumers agreeing that getting paid more quickly is preferable. These consumers — as well as business owners — rarely have the opportunity to receive those disbursements at the speed they desire, however. This is due to historical reliance upon paper checks within the payments industry, Sherri Haymond, executive vice president of digital partnerships for card network Mastercard, explained in a recent PYMNTS interview. Checks are often the only option for consumers to receive insurance or corporate disbursements, Haymond said, while business-to-business (B2B) payments lean even more heavily on paper-based methods. Approximately $30 trillion is sent to consumers and U.S. businesses via paper checks each year, in fact.

Mastercard has therefore partnered with instant payments innovator Ingo Money in an effort to reduce that dependency. The two are joining together to enable speedier payments to these top treasury banks and their corporate clients. The companies look to bridge the gap between the digital technology and what those businesses have previously been utilizing, according to recent reports.

FACING DISBURSEMENTS CHALLENGES

Payors, consumers struggle to find middle ground

Disbursements coming from non-government entities also have their share of challenges, mainly the distinct gap between what consumers and payors consider to be instant payments. Recent PYMNTS data found that 58.4 percent of consumers stated they received nongovernment or corporate disbursements via methods that are not instant, for example. Payors reported that they only make 45.3 percent of these disbursements via methods that they consider to be noninstant, however, and that the majority of their disbursements are made with faster payment methods.

This perception gap could prove critical in the coming months as the pandemic prompts consumers and businesses to ask for faster, digital payment methods rather than legacy options. Finding a middle ground between what payors and what those receiving disbursements view as instant is therefore an essential challenge for companies and their payment processors.

Microbusinesses hunt for faster payment opportunities

This communication divide also appears to extend to microbusinesses — companies run by 10 or fewer individuals — according to recent PYMNTS research. Our report found that 78.8 percent of payors stated they provided instant payment options for B2B disbursements, yet only 52.4 percent of microbusinesses had the option of using these methods to receive their funds. It also found that microbusinesses are more likely to agree to new partnerships that come with the ability to receive instant disbursements.

Bridging this divide is also critical because smaller businesses have been especially affected financially by the pandemic. Small businesses that do not have swift access to their incoming disbursements may struggle to make payroll or pay vendors, adding stress to their business operations as well as to their employees' financial lives. Educating microbusinesses regarding the instant payment options they could potentially utilize is therefore likely to be a more essential challenge for payment providers within the next few months.

Pandemic pushes regulatory changes to payday loans, disbursements

The ongoing global health crisis's financial impacts have continued to ripple out and impact consumers, with one out of every three Americans noting they have lost income due to the pandemic. Widespread financial distress has led to regulators in several U.S. states working to aid these individuals, including taking a closer look at the payday loan industry as well as on-demand payment services. Nebraska recently became the 17th state to cap payday loan interest rates — notoriously as high as 400 percent in some cases — at 36 percent to reduce workers' financial stresses.

Nebraska is also examining how digital on-demand payment methods could help workers gain access to their incoming funds more quickly without taking on interest or additional debt. These solutions disburse money via instant channels once employees have earned their wages, rather than having these individuals wait two weeks to receive their pay. This could have a positive impact on workers that have been placed in dire economic straits, especially considering that up to 60 percent of Americans currently live paycheck to paycheck.

NEW PAYMENT DEVELOPMENTS

How virtual cards could streamline healthcare B2B disbursements

The healthcare industry is attempting to manage supply chains and cash flows amid significant change. This is leading healthcare providers to consider alternative payment methods for their supplies or for incoming payments as even digital methods such as ACH often lack the transparency providers need to run their operations smoothly. Using virtual cards to make B2B disbursements or accept payments could be one way to help mitigate some of these problems, John Innes, CEO of ACH Processing Company, said in a recent PYMNTS interview.

Virtual cards allow healthcare providers to view how payments are being made in real time and enable them to keep track of which payments are left outstanding or what disbursements have been collected already. This enables much needed transparency and insight into their cash flow. It also eliminates the need for these companies to wait weeks to receive paper checks, reducing some of their reliance on such methods and improving efficiency.

UK government's CCS leans on mobile for instant payment expansion

The United Kingdom government's Crown Commercial Service's (CCS) Payment Acceptance Framework recently announced a partnership with a mobile payments provider in the hopes that it could expand instant payment adoption to the country's public sector. This means that all the organizations that have integrated with the CCS's payment framework will have access to mobile payment solutions, allowing them to send or receive disbursements with speed. The partnership aims to drive the use of mobile-first disbursement solutions for U.K. companies. The move comes as faster payments are beginning to consolidate within the U.K. both for consumers and for businesses, meaning more transparency and efficiency is expected when collecting or receiving disbursements.

HOW TAPPING INSTANT PAYMENTS FOR DISBURSEMENTS CAN HELP STATE, FEDERAL AGENCIES FOSTER FINANCIAL SECURITY

Consumers in the U.S. are still reeling from the lasting financial impacts brought about by the first months of the pandemic. Sweeping unemployment, rising medical costs and other factors have forced many to search for other sources of income. This includes relief payments sent out by state or federal government agencies, from Social Security checks to stimulus funds still left outstanding from the CARES Act passed in late March. Approximately 12 million consumers with lower incomes or those without bank accounts are still waiting for stimulus checks to appear, and the final deadline for these individuals to register with the IRS for such payments passed on Nov. 21.

Identifying these consumers is only step one, however. Getting them the money often involves sending out paper checks, adding to delays. The stimulus check struggle appears emblematic of a larger reliance on paper disbursement processes within both federal and state government agencies for a broad spectrum of payments, despite the fact that payment recipients themselves are calling for faster disbursement methods. A January PYMNTS study found that 37.4 percent of consumers reported wanting to receive disbursements via instant payment methods, yet only 24.7 percent of government agencies reported supporting any such methods.

The gap between the number of consumers asking for money more swiftly and the number of government agencies actually able to meet that demand has only become more critical over the past few months as the pandemic has continued. The following Deep Dive examines how the pandemic has affected vulnerable consumers' financial needs as well as their expectations for incoming disbursements. It also examines how government agencies' continued reliance on paper checks for stimulus, Social Security or other disbursements can have lasting negative effects on their constituents' financial health and why interest in digital or instant disbursement methods is on the rise.

Examining the disbursements divide

Fixing the disbursements gap may seem simple, but state and government agencies that have been moving money through manual, paper-based processes for decades need to upgrade their outdated infrastructure before they can move forward. This need is also not unique to government agencies — the treasury banks responsible for helping businesses make payments are also fighting against outdated infrastructures, as about $30 trillion annually sent out via paper checks to both businesses and consumers, for example. Government agencies must also manage several layers of inter-department communications as well as compliance checks to send out funds, adding further complexity to an overwhelmed and lagging disbursements process that was built around paper checks. Recent PYMNTS data found that 50.1 percent of consumer disbursements by U.S. companies and agencies are made via such legacy payment methods.

These established manual disbursement methods are butting heads with a consumer population that is becoming more accustomed to fast, digital access to their money. This is especially true as more Americans begin to receive instant disbursements from nongovernment entities such as insurance firms or investment companies. Those in the Generation Z and millennial demographics are spearheading this shift to digital, as they are the most likely to have received money through instant payment methods. Seventeen percent of Gen Z consumers have received a nongovernment disbursement instantly, as have 15.6 percent of millennials, according to PYMNTS research.

These digital natives have been driving support for instant disbursements since they started earning more and participating widely in the financial ecosystem. The demand for instant payments that allow consumers to easily receive and spend their money has only grown since the start of the pandemic as Americans of all age groups adjusted to navigate the negative financial effects of the health crisis. Consumers are becoming less tolerant of checks and other lagging disbursement methods as time goes on, with less than 10 percent of consumers noting they would rather receive a check than an instant payment. Government agencies are facing the same check resistance, and clinging to checks could have severe effects on the financial health of millions of consumers.

Checks and the economic balance

Government agencies are still supporting paper check payments because they are a way to send funds to underbanked or unbanked consumers, though state and federal agencies have been considering digital alternatives for some time. Forty-four out of 50 states were seeking ways to upgrade their digital disbursement and deposit tools as of January, for example, and many state agencies offer some digital payment capabilities for their citizens. The development and adoption of these electronic disbursements has moved cautiously, however, with agencies again trying to fold innovative payment methods into systems widely designed for paper-based, physical payments.

The pandemic has largely shattered the advantages of that measured approach as widespread financial distress continues to harm millions of U.S. consumers. Approximately 60 percent of Americans live paycheck to paycheck, and 8 million have fallen under the poverty line due to the pandemic's effects.

This indicates that paper checks may be outgrowing their benefits — even for the unbanked — at a faster curve. Implementing some form of instant payment or considering the use cases for mobile or peer-to-peer (P2P) disbursements — especially for those that are unbanked, as these methods often do not require bank accounts — could therefore help government agencies stay on top of vulnerable consumers' needs.
