WHAT'S INSIDE

Restrictions on in-person transactions and other health-related measures over the past 17 months have proven to be strong incentives for digital change among consumers. As a result, peer-to-peer (P2P) payments are having their moment. These services have seen particularly strong adoption recently, with almost four out of five United States consumers using them last year through either their financial institutions (FIs) or third-party providers. This expansion is not just confined to the U.S., either. The global P2P payments sector totaled nearly $2 billion in 2020 and is on track to reach $4.6 billion in 2028.

Another testament to the appeal of P2P services is consumers' desire to use them even after the pandemic ends, with 89 percent of consumers saying they plan to use these tools at least as much as they do now. The message behind these findings is clear: Consumers are looking for digital payment alternatives, and only fast, seamless experiences will do.

Despite this impressive growth, there are ways to encourage even greater expansion in the P2P payments space. A bevy of providers currently vie for consumers' and businesses' attention, including Cash App, Venmo and Zelle. Transacting via these services typically requires downloading specific apps, as they operate on closed loops. Unfortunately, this keeps the space fragmented and adds an extra level of friction that could be just enough to keep a sizable share of potential users from leveraging P2P payments to the fullest extent. The key to overcoming this hurdle and encouraging even greater adoption will be to develop solutions that allow for interoperability between services, giving consumers true choice in the P2P payments space without having to stick to one service.

Around the disbursements space

The global P2P lending market grew between 2015 and 2020 and is expected to witness a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 31 percent over the next five years, according to a new report. It found that P2P lending — when consumers or businesses borrow money from each other directly rather than involving FIs — typically entails a borrower seeking unsecured personal, business or educational loans. It is seen as an efficient option that eliminates paper and can offer higher returns than more traditional financing offerings.

P2P platforms also are making waves in the cryptocurrency space, especially in regions where government regulations are clamping down on crypto trading. Crypto owners in Nigeria, for example, recently traded $38 million USD in bitcoin volume between July 4 and Aug. 4 via LocalBitcoins and Paxful, two P2P exchange platforms. This activity comes as the nation continues to roll out new restrictions designed to prevent banks from handling bitcoin.

Digital payment methods have made major headway among consumers over the past year, but too many businesses are missing out on this shift, according to Ingo Money CEO Drew Edwards. In a recent interview with PYMNTS he said myriad business-to-business (B2B) firms still are stuck mailing out paper checks, which can take weeks to arrive and fail to open channels of communication between senders and recipients regarding additional services and capabilities. Opportunities for digital innovation abound, he explained, and have the potential to transform sectors including insurance disbursements, payroll and supplier payments.

For more on these stories and other disbursements headlines, read the Tracker's News and Trends section (p. 12).

Neobank Varo on addressing the meteoric rise in P2P payments adoption

The use of P2P payment apps nearly doubled year over year in 2020 as consumers sought contactless ways to pay for goods and services and send money to friends and family. This rapid increase in usage requires consideration from banks and P2P providers serving growing numbers of users, however. In this month's Feature Story (p. 8), Wesley Wright, chief commercial and product officer at neobank Varo, discusses the explosive expansion of P2P payments and how partnering with third-party P2P services providers soon will be necessary to keep up with the demands of both consumers and businesses.

Deep Dive: Why P2P payments are on the rise and how interoperability can take them higher

It did not take consumers long to make digital adjustments to their purchasing methods once the pandemic became a part of their lives. P2P payments in particular are winning over consumers eager for convenience and instant settlement, but there are innumerable services available and each one operates on a closed loop. This month's Deep Dive (p. 16) examines the rise of P2P payment solutions and why interoperability will be key to helping this space expand further.

EXECUTIVE INSIGHT

What hurdles are keeping more consumers from using P2P payments, and how can they be addressed?

It's no longer the stuff of science fiction to press a button and instantly pay your trainer, babysitter or your half of dinner and a movie to a friend. What might have required a paper check or scrounging for bills in your pocket in years past can now be handled quickly and easily on your phone or online.

The plethora of P2P platforms making this possible, including Venmo, PayPal, Cash App and Zelle, have become household names [and], in some cases, even verbs. But the abundance of these options is also the Achilles' heel of the industry. The dirty secret of P2P payment solutions is their lack of interoperability.

Want to pay your guitar instructor using the Cash App, but they only have Venmo? You're out of luck. The only way to use P2P is for the sender to download the other's preferred app and to link their bank account. And then the onus is on the sender to establish multiple P2P platform relationships, depending on [how] each recipient wants to [be] paid. This is because each of these apps and platforms operates as a walled garden. No one is allowed inside the other's castle.

Ingo Money is innovating with the industry's first pay anyone, cross-platform P2P payments network. With active connections to more than 4.5 billion consumer accounts, all the sender has to do is select the recipient, and the network works out the best way to get the money safely to them.

For P2P to become truly ubiquitous and commonplace for everyone, the industry will need to reimagine it — remove the frictions that exist today and offer true consumer choice within the system.

Neobank Varo on serving customers' needs as P2P payments see a rapid rise in usage

P2P payments have demonstrated extraordinary growth in the U.S. over the past 17 months, and this trend is expected to continue. Consumers of all ages have embraced P2P payments as their financial lives have undergone immense changes during the pandemic and as FIs roll out new digital payment options to meet their needs.

Perhaps the most stunning growth in P2P transactions has occurred among millennials. One survey found that 46 percent of consumers ages 23 to 38 tapped P2P payments this year, up from 23 percent in the spring of 2020. Gains were not restricted to just millennials, however. Both Generation X and Generation Z consumers increased their use of such tools, with 37 percent of consumers in each of these groups accessing P2P payments this year. Even baby boomers have been using P2P payments more frequently this year, with 13 percent saying they use them.

San Francisco-based mobile-only neobank Varo has witnessed this P2P growth up close. Wesley Wright, chief commercial and product officer at the nationally chartered FI, told PYMNTS during a recent interview that the rise of P2P payments reflects a nationwide shift. He explained that Varo's customers have been requesting P2P payments heavily since the company launched in 2017, and the functionality was added two years later as a result.

"The growth has been pretty significant. [P2P payments are] pretty popular," he said. "There's strong P2P word-of-mouth, and lots of people like it as a way to move money between family members or friends for various reasons, instantaneously and at no charge."

Wright said Varo has observed little friction among the P2P users on its platform despite the dramatic rise in P2P payments usage in recent months. The system is designed to make these transactions straightforward, he said, and maintaining a scalable solution has been key to accommodating increased need.

"That's just a normal challenge of having a high-growth business," Wright noted.

Extending P2P functionalities

There still are numerous opportunities for P2P payments providers to boost the technology's adoption further. In Varo's case, its roughly 1 million customers can use its P2P platform only to send and receive money to one another, though Wright said it is considering whether to change this. One option currently on the table is providing an additional type of P2P offering that would allow customers to send and receive money across a separate platform.

"That's something we're considering because we're now a chartered bank," he said. "Previously, our sponsor bank did not want to participate, but now we control that decision on our own."

Varo needs to answer several questions before making the decision to add another

P2P service to its payments lineup, Wright explained. The company must determine how likely customers will be to use the new offering, examine the costs and fees it will entail and make other assessments as it selects a vendor or partner. He said adopting such a feature is likely to benefit FIs such as Varo by helping them form deeper relationships with customers.

Another critical factor is security, Wright said, and any P2P service Varo adopts would need to have robust fraud protection measures in place. He noted that prospective vendors must find ways to ensure that bad actors do not take over customers' accounts and leverage P2P services to drain them immediately and irrevocably.

Where P2P payments go from here

Wright also expects P2P payments to quickly become a preferred payment method among businesses. Many merchants are tired of handling checks and are eager to avoid rising credit card fees, and P2P solutions could offer them a speedy, frictionless way to receive instant payments.

"I'm at the doctor's office for a routine checkup right now, and they don't want to take credit cards because of the costs," he said. "These payment services will grow, and we want our customers to be able to move their money [and] pay anyone, anytime, instantly and for free."

These payment services will grow, and we want our customers to be able to move their money [and] pay anyone, anytime, instantly and for free.

The pandemic has been instrumental in accelerating P2P payments adoption among consumers of all ages, with consumers seeking digital ways to pay and be paid more quickly. Partnering with the right P2P services providers and using scalable solutions that fit the needs of a growing customer base will be key to maintaining this momentum long after the health crisis has passed.

NEWS & TRENDS

P2P DISBURSEMENTS DEVELOPMENTS

Survey finds that four-fifths of US consumers tapped P2P payments in 2020

Another payment trend worth watching for companies across all industries is the rising popularity of mobile P2P services. Consumers have used these services to instantly make and receive payments from other individuals for several years, but businesses also are beginning to recognize the opportunity in offering such disbursements. One survey found that 79 percent of U.S. consumers tapped P2P services last year — a testament to customers' growing familiarity with these solutions and their willingness to branch out into new payment methods during the pandemic.

There appears to be room for even more growth, however. The study found that half of consumers were unsure of whether their FIs enabled P2P payments via email addresses or phone numbers, and 20 percent said they were sure their FIs did not offer P2P functionalities.

P2P lending market expected to witness CAGR of 31 percent through 2026

P2P disbursements also are becoming more prevalent in the lending space as growing numbers of consumers and small businesses seek flexible, efficient financing options. A new report found that the global P2P lending market expanded steadily between 2015 and 2020, and it is expected to witness a CAGR of 31 percent over the next five years. P2P lending, in which individuals or entities use platforms to borrow money directly from one another without involving financial institutions, can see borrowers seek unsecured personal, business or educational loans. It is seen as an efficient and paperless financing option that can offer higher returns than traditional lending solutions.

The report highlighted several reasons behind the market's growth, notably the banking sector's increasing digitization and the proliferation of small to mid-sized businesses (SMBs) seeking financing. In addition, the development of blockchain tools and contracts offering reliable and transparent lending is driving expansion.

Why interoperability is required to foster ubiquity in the P2P payments space

P2P solutions providers have seen robust growth during the pandemic, prompting many to jockey for greater market share as a rising number of consumers tap into their services. According to Ingo Money CEO Drew Edwards, however, there still is one issue that must be resolved to enable the payment choices that consumers crave and drive the space to new heights:

interoperability. During a recent interview with PYMNTS he said the closed nature of P2P networks means most parties must download and use specific apps to enable certain transfers. Doing so may be easier than signing up with banks, Edwards said, but it still represents a level of friction that can hinder adoption. He explained that working to solve for this issue will require payout capabilities that allow senders to simply select recipients and have the network handle the rest.

Nigeria's push to ban banks from dealing with bitcoin prompts rise in P2P crypto trading

The Nigerian government's continued efforts to prohibit the nation's banks from handling bitcoin are driving a surge in the use of P2P services to facilitate trading. The country earlier this year reinforced existing legislation that prohibited FIs from dealing with the cryptocurrency, but this has prompted Nigerians to move to P2P platforms for their trading needs instead. The nation's crypto users traded almost $38 million USD in bitcoin between July 4 and Aug. 4, largely via two P2P exchange platforms: LocalBitcoins and Paxful. Trading volume was similar the month before at $37.7 million. This activity suggests that P2P platforms will serve as crucial services for bitcoin owners, especially in areas in which official usage is highly regulated or discouraged.

THE INSTANT PAYMENT INCENTIVE FOR BUSINESSES

Why businesses must overcome resistance to replacing checks with digital payments

Advances in the connected economy and digitization over the last year have largely been limited to consumers, according to Ingo Money CEO Drew Edwards. Edwards noted in a recent interview with PYMNTS that most payments innovations over the last 50 years have focused on how consumers pay merchants, yet companies still are sending out paper checks. The downside to paying with checks is that B2B payment processes not only are friction-filled and costly but also can take weeks to arrive. A check may represent the end of a transaction, but a digital payment can provide the start of a conversation between sender and recipient for additional services and capabilities, he said.

Digitizing B2B payments will be challenging in some of the areas that need it most, such as healthcare, insurance and sports betting, according to Edwards. These sectors are highly regulated and cause decision-makers to move slowly, yet these are the use cases in which opportunities for transformation abound, including in payroll, insurance disbursements and supplier payments.

How SMBs can tap instant payments' advantages to receive emergency funds

Pandemic-driven financial tensions around the globe are making instant payment options more valuable, particularly for SMBs. Small businesses in the United Kingdom faced delays in receiving government grants and support, especially during the earlier months of the health crisis, and this caused many SMBs to close. The recovery is underway, but a multitude of businesses still are waiting for financial support. The story has been different in the United States, however, largely due to the federal government's use of digital payments to deliver aid to firms quickly. One firm's instant lending platform has facilitated almost $8 billion in applications for the Small Business Administration's (SBA) Paycheck Protection Program (PPP), for example. The solution allows SMBs to prefill their details via a portal integrated into participating bank lenders' sites, streamlining the process. The instant payments efficiency offered to U.S. SMBs underscores the importance of making seamless digital payment options available in the U.K. as the country works to right itself economically.

GIG WORKERS' INSTANT ACCESS DEMANDS

Two-thirds of gig workers would prefer working for companies that offer on-demand payments

Companies are embracing new digital tools and technologies to pay workers more quickly instead of waiting for the next scheduled pay cycle. Rideshare drivers who earn hundreds of dollars in a weekend will not receive the funds for weeks, but they must find ways to keep the gas tank filled until then. Instant access to earnings allows cash management according to the worker's needs. This concept is not limited to gig workers, either: Hourly or salaried employees also can face financial stresses between pay periods. Earned-wage access is becoming more popular among companies as a result, granting employees immediate access to earned funds.

One survey found that two-thirds of gig workers would prefer to work for a company that offers on-demand payouts over a company with a weekly or monthly pay cycle. Seventy percent of workers also said they would be willing to work more if they could be certain they would receive instant payments for the extra shifts.

Canadian gig economy workers gravitate toward faster digital payments, mobile wallets

Gig economy workers' preferences to be paid digitally increased during the pandemic, engineering a major change in the payments space, according to new Canadian study. Gig workers most preferred Apple Pay and Google Pay, with 49 percent having used the mobile wallets in the last month to receive payments. Twenty-two percent of respondents prefer cash payments and 19 percent prefer checks.

One in 10 Canadian residents are employed as gig workers, and nearly 37 percent of the nation's businesses employ them, according to the study. Researchers surveyed 1,500 Canadian adults and 509 Canadian businesses and found that 45 percent of gig workers expect their payouts to be electronic, while 34 percent expect same-day disbursements. Gig workers expect fast, secure and transparent payments, but one in five Canadian gig workers said it can take weeks to be paid once the work is complete.

DEEP DIVE

HOW P2P PAYMENTS ARE CATCHING ON AMONG CONSUMERS AND BUSINESSES, AND WHY CHASING INTEROPERABILITY IS KEY TO GROWTH

Once social distancing, retail closures and other health-related changes became part of daily life for individuals worldwide, it did not take long for them to adjust their purchasing habits to match the new normal. Consumers of all ages began looking for payment methods that enabled them to avoid in-person interactions, leading many to migrate to digital solutions to handle their payment needs. A December 2020 survey of more than 2,000 Americans revealed that since the health crisis began, 65 percent had used a mobile app or digital platform to make a purchase for the first time. While payment providers and merchants have long provided consumers with digital shopping experiences, fast payment methods that allowed them to avoid physical contact and transact seamlessly around the globe caught on in a big way last year as eCommerce accelerated.

Certain payment tools have seen particularly robust growth as they help consumers meet their new needs, including P2P payments. P2P solution providers allow individuals and businesses alike to use apps or payment portals to instantly transfer funds to each other, making them well-suited to the fast-paced, digital nature of modern commerce. The survey found that P2P payments usage nearly doubled year over year in 2020, with a staggering 77 percent of respondents saying they used a P2P app last year compared to 42 percent in 2019. What's more, 89 percent of consumers plan to continue using P2P apps as often as they do now even after the pandemic ends — a testament to their staying power.

Still, there is room for improvement in the P2P payments space. Consumers and businesses tend to favor certain apps when transacting, with 32 percent of consumers using Cash App, 26 percent tapping PayPal-owned Venmo and 20 percent leveraging Early Warning Services' Zelle. The trouble is that these services operate separately on closed networks, meaning that users who wish to pay and be paid must agree to download and use whichever solution their counterparts are using. The following Deep Dive examines the rise of P2P payments and why interoperability is needed to help them expand across borders in the years ahead.

Riding the P2P payment rails

P2P services have witnessed a boom in adoption during the pandemic, and there is no reason to believe consumers' habits will change once it ends. Recent research found that roughly 20 percent of consumers are using P2P payments more now than they did prior to the health crisis, and the method no longer is seen as just a way to send money to friends and family. These instant digital payments now are being used for a whole host of expenses, such as compensating small businesses and service providers, donating to charities and even paying rent.

P2P payment usage often is associated with younger consumers, but recent surveys have shown that these options are catching on with consumers of all ages. One study revealed that 45 percent of U.S. consumers ages 55 to 72 have used or intend to use P2P services, in fact. Consumers in this age group also generally seem self-assured and satisfied when using these tools, with 69 percent saying they were confident using P2P payments technology and 77 percent saying these transactions were seamless. This suggests that these services will begin to see greater adoption among consumers interested in participating in a digitized economy.

FIs around the nation are becoming more aware of the draw of P2P payments, with large banks as well as credit unions and regional players integrating these services. As a result, the global P2P payment sector accounted for almost $2 billion last year and is expected to total $4.6 billion by 2028 – a CAGR of more than 11 percent.

The need for P2P payments interoperability

P2P payments services are poised to continue to grow, but there still are several hurdles preventing consumers from using the solutions to make instant payments to anyone, anywhere and at any time. The closed nature of these P2P networks means that the consumers and businesses using them must download and leverage specific apps, whether it be Cash App, Venmo or Zelle, if they wish to transact with partners via a specific service.

Changing this will require the creation of services that allow for interoperability across all platforms, according to Ingo Money CEO Drew Edwards. Allowing consumers to use their preferred P2P apps is the key to giving them real payments choice, he explained, removing another friction from the P2P payments process and moving the space closer to ubiquity.

P2P payments usage has accelerated rapidly over the past 17 months, and it shows few signs of slowing. Giving consumers the opportunity to seamlessly and instantly transact with peers and businesses across multiple platforms likely will be key to driving the space's growth to new heights in the future.
